Length 662 feet

Dream of a Lobster Fiend

Gourman, who has been enjoying Lobster, Beer, Ice Cream, etc., has a horrible dream. He takes a colored lady to a ball and is fired out. He jumps into a second story window and attires himself in female clothes. He is chased and stripped of the petticoats and climbs a telegraph pole, walks the wires into a third story window. Falls out and is surrounded by Indians, who build a fire around him. At last, much to his relief, his family awakens him and he resolves never again to eat lobster.

Length 392 feet

The Sponge Industry

A very interesting and instructive picture of how sponge is gathered by the divers and hook pole fishers. Also cleaning and shipping process. The picture will receive much favor.

Released Thursday, May 23rd, 1912

Facts and Comments

AN OLD expert in the film exchange business, speaking the other day of the changes in the renting branch, remarked that in many respects the exhibitors have been the gainers through the changes of the last two years. Many exhibitors today are printing programs covering an entire week in advance. Of course the distribution of such programs is most agreeable to patrons and has a stimulating effect on the business. In some of the bigger cities exhibitors have been able to get good returns for the renting privilege of their programs. These programs have a genuine advertising value, in no sense inferior to that of the regular theatrical programs. Under the old system of renting reels such a thing would have been next to impossible. In the fierce daily struggle for "a little the best of it" in the matter of service no exhibitor, unless he paid a big premium, could know two days ahead just what kind of a program he was going to have.

Today the program can be billed seven days in advance and as a rule it is far better adjusted than in the old days. The programs for hundreds of exhibitors are made up by the one man, who is in a position to know both the needs of the exhibitors and the possibilities of filling these needs. The exchange man is not consulted by the manufacturers as to what pictures he wants and he must take what is offered. He knows the releases, however, for a month or more ahead and knowing what the exhibitors demand he can balance their programs for them to their general satisfaction. It must be borne in mind that the manufacturers follow no hard and fast rules of producing certain varieties of pictures at certain intervals. It would be foolish to ask them to do this, for after all the motion picture is an art, and an art depends largely on inspiration, which cannot be commanded and controlled like a lot of lumber or an assortment of woolen goods or other merchandise. If the manufacturer is able to strike a pretty fair balance in the variety of his pictures he is doing all that can reasonably be expected of him. Most exhibitors want about an even proportion of what is called "drama" and "comedy," with a spice of scenics, topicals and industrials. The proportion between these varieties is pretty well maintained today just about as the exhibitor wants it. While some makes are fancied more than others, no one company today overshadows the rest as was the case a little more than two years ago. A high average is sustained throughout. From the exhibitors' viewpoint this is the ideal state of affairs. What the exhibitor today needs most is an increase of big features. Success for exhibitors as well as manufacturers lies along those paths. It is pleasing to note that the increase in quantity has stopped. We have enough releases, but it is easy to improve on the quality of a good many of them.

THE City of Baltimore has decided to buy outright, as a permanent municipal investment, a set of motion pictures made for the purpose of showing the advantages of the Monumental City as a place of residence and of business. The appropriation for this purpose was passed in Councils without a dissenting voice. The advertising value of the motion picture is being generally recognized today. Several abortive attempts have been made in the past to organize companies, which were to exploit this end of the film industry, notably in Philadelphia and Chicago. Today many clever, capable and energetic men have interested themselves in the scheme of advertising through the medium of the motion picture and we expect to see great things in this part of the industry in the near future. The motion picture is taken more seriously every day.

BEFORE an assemblage of experts in a large French city a series of lessons and problems in mathematics were demonstrated on a moving picture screen. They were followed by a series of demonstrations in geometry. Everybody present agreed that the change of the geometrical figures, their composition and analysis was far superior to the old-fashioned blackboard work. The exhibition concluded with a most remarkable feature—the astronomical systems of Ptolemy and Copernicus were shown, and as the differences between the two theories were unravelled on the screen it was agreed that even the dullest pupil is bound to get some idea of the subject. Words alone would leave three out of five average pupils in doubt and uncertainty, while the pictures are absolutely convincing to all. One of the yellow journals of this city, the other day, complained editorially of the proposed use of the motion picture for educational purposes, characterizing all cinematographic education as "peptonized and predigested teaching." An educational system, which can give us a quick and thorough comprehension of the movements of the heavenly bodies is the most effective known at this day. If this method is "peptonized and predigested teaching" let them make the most of it.

DESPITE the emphatic public approval of the Mayor's proposed ordinance regulating the exhibition of motion pictures, the Board of Aldermen of New York City, insists on obtruding its mongrel ordinance upon the public. It appears now that the "Society for the Prevention of Crime" is in favor of this absurd piece of aldermanic wisdom. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has recorded its opinion on the Nichols ordinance in no uncertain terms and has urged the exhibitors here to "nip it in the bud" more than a month ago. We do not say that the present system of censorship is an ideal one, or that its decisions are infallible. The system, however, has been tried out in practice and has produced good results. The decisions of the Board have on the whole been fair and liberal. There is no doubt as to the high personal character of the members and their good and honorable motives. Today the approval of the "National Board of Censorship" is regarded favorably in every part of the country and has won the respect of the authorities in every large city. When it is remembered that the Board has no power to enforce its decisions, that it is called a "national" board only by courtesy, and that its jurisdiction rests entirely upon the good will and consent of the manufacturers, its work is deserving of decided praise. The Nichols ordinance offers not even a probability of a better and more effective system of censorship. Just why the Board of Aldermen insists on pushing this matter when it must know that the Mayor will veto their ordinance is more than we can comprehend. The desire to make itself ridiculous is one of the inherent qualities and time-honored traditions of Boards of Aldermen, to which the New York body is living up most religiously.

There is a "rider" tacked on to this bill, which provides for the criminal prosecution of an exhibitor, whose pictures in the judgment of the "inspectors" are in violation of the ordinance. While we expect Mayor Gaynor to make short work of this nonsense, if it ever reaches him, it seems to us, that the organized exhibitors of Greater New York ought to be heard from in this connection. If an organization of exhibitors fails to take some action in a matter of this kind it does not understand the uses and purposes of organized power and seems neglectful of its plain duties. The ordinance also provides for the closing of Motion Picture Theaters on Sundays. There can be no doubt whatever that either graft or special and well-known interests are behind this proposed legislation. Public sentiment does not demand any such drastic and confiscatory action. The motion picture more than ever before in its history is firmly entrenched in public favor. We hope that this particular raid on the motion picture theaters will be defeated in such a radical fashion, that we will never hear of another Nichols ordinance.

WHILE our law entitles any one, who has been cinematographed without his consent in writing, to bring his action for damages and have the photographer arrested and punished as a misdemeanant, European courts are a little more tender of the rights of motion picture manufacturers. "Jack" Binns, the wireless hero, would have fared poorly at the hands of a Vienna court, which recently decided a most interesting case in point. It appears that a camera man attended a wrestling match between two champions. As he started to take pictures of the match the principals protested and wanted to know "what was in it for them," before allowing the camera man to go on. The latter said he would pay them something, with which the wrestlers were satisfied, stipulating, however, that the pictures should not be publicly exhibited before the question of compensation was arranged to their satisfaction. The pictures were taken and duly exhibited, but no money was paid to the wrestlers. An offer of $10 was made by the film maker and rejected by the wrestlers. The matter was then brought into court. In his defense the camera man urged some very ingenious arguments. He said that the wrestlers were benefited by the cinematographic exhibition of their skill and prowess, as the exhibition added to their fame and made their services more valuable to any club, that might decide to take them on. He claimed further, that prominent persons in all walks of life had repeatedly been photographed without their permission having been obtained and had never made any complaint. On the other hand, the manager of the wrestling match claimed that a profitable engagement in a large city had been cancelled on him, because after seeing the cinematographic exhibition the people there did not care to witness the original match. The Court clearly sympathized with the film maker, but as there had been a technical violation of the law it fined the camera man $10. Binns, it will be remembered, obtained a verdict of $12,500, or thereabouts, because his name and alleged picture had been used by the Vitagraph Company without his consent in writing. We are now waiting to hear from the Court of Appeals whether such an outrageous verdict will be allowed to stand.

The Value of Criticism.

By W. H. Jackson.

ONE of the wisest men who ever lived said: "If you reprove me it shall be as an excellent oil upon my head," such was the value he placed upon criticism. The son of this wise man who not only inherited his father's wisdom, but also excelled him, said further, "rebuke a fool and he will still continue in his folly." These quotations form teachings from which principles of value have ever been learned. The value of criticism is judged by the knowledge and circumstances of the critic, and his ability to make suggestions to remedy the errors he points out. To criticise without knowledge or the power to improve, is the arrogance of impudence and must be scorned. To criticise properly and with just cause, adding the advisability of change, improvement or correction, is legitimate and wise; to heed the same displays, also an exercise of wisdom, while resentment is too often an evidence of a harmful self-assurance and false dignity. The very existence of censorship is brought about by the indifference to other and milder forms of correction. If "the law was made for evildoers" surely censorship is made necessary for "unwisedoers."

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has never been a censor in the strict sense of the word, neither must it ever become one; it must, however, act as a critic and advisor, to any and all interests of every side of moving picture work. For this purpose it must be thoroughly competent and, as such, must equally be thoroughly respected. The office of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is as a clearing house for every interest of the moving picture. Nowhere else is there centered the knowledge and information so diverse, yet so intricate as there.

If, therefore, there goes forth on the pages of the WORLD anything favorable or unfavorable, commendation or criticism, suggestion or advice; it is not the assumption or arrogance of a personal opinion; but the verdict of evidence—the sifting of facts, the extraction of knowledge with experience, and, as such is of value to every one interested.

If there were printed upon the pages of the WORLD without discrimination, all that comes to the office of the paper, the whole fraternity would be in a constant turmoil; many of the readers have much to thank the WORLD for, because of its judicious siftings. On the other hand, whatever finds its way into print is valuable, in that it is the product of every care and thought. Agreeably with the truisms heading this article, no criticism is made unaccompanied with suggestions for improvement; and therefore in the interest of any party affected thereby.

The aim of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD as impressed by its late editor and still animating all his associates, is of the highest possible standard; that their suggestions are not always welcomed or acted upon is not surprising, he is a wise man who can take reproof "as an oil," and wiser still if he acts in deference to a more educated judgment, matured in the center of experience. Only last week letters appeared in the WORLD condemning the abominable practice of putting an educational picture and a silly farce on the same reel; this incongruity is resented by every decent audience, and arouses just comments far from complimentary to the makers.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD pointed out this absurdity more than a year ago, especially so when a biblical picture and a poor comic were thus linked together; still the evil practice prevails..

"Am I your enemy because I tell you the truth?" is a most fitting question to ask under these conditions. It takes some people a long time to know that those who rightly, timely, and properly tell us our faults, are our best friends.

In the newspaper world the argument is advanced that "publicity secures honesty," the light of that which reveals and enlightens is a benefactor: therefore, just criticism secures purity and perfection, dispelling errors as light drives away darkness, securing that moral health desirable, for as the germ of disease cannot live to do harm in the sunlight, neither can corruption breed in pure water, so that which hinders education cannot thrive where just criticism abounds.

The painter invites his associates to pass judgment upon his work ere it passes before public gaze. The sculptor loves the advice of competent friendly enemies, whose suggestions increase the deftness and delicacy of his chisel. The actor and actress pass through a perfect ordeal of torture often increasing to abuse before their manager will submit them to public scrutiny.

There is no art or science in the wide world, where this close attention to the principles advocated here are so essential as in the making of moving pictures. To be kept in touch with what is wanted and how it is wanted, is strong wisdom on the part of the scenario writer and film producer. It is a fact that at this moment a firm is producing at an enormous cost, a set of films not desired by anyone, and when placed before the public, although intended for educational purposes, will be refused by those in authority from the beginning. Nevertheless, there is no power yet known, that can convince this firm of the absurdity of its doings.

In the course of time, when these films meet their "Waterloo," it will become the duty of this page to refer to this prediction. To suggest to any firm what is wanted is a piece of undaunted presumption. The writer is fully acquainted with the capabilities of a certain firm, and wishes they might produce a certain class of pictures for which success awaits them. They insist, however, in wasting a lot of valuable time in producing a line of "comics" for which they are totally unfitted, and which "jar" even the smaller minds so easily pleased.

The day of "specialists" in film producing has not yet arrived, while the moving picture business is no longer "in its infancy" it is yet in its early youth, and even as many a man does not "find himself" until battered by many an experience so many makers have not yet "found themselves." Experimental is the title best suited to the present period in the history of picture making. Only after it has passed through its "experimental" period will it possess the qualifications necessary to meet the times.

Progress is daily being made in many directions, not only is there a decided advance in cinematography, but public opinion, and authoritative approval is rapidly multiplying. This necessarily means that greater demands will be made upon both subject matter and the nature of the production; wise workers in all classes will seek information, and positively court criticism, to enable them more thoroughly to fill the desired anticipations and needs, of satisfactory cinematography in all its branches.

This article is the product of experience, and is written with the laudable ambition of helping any who will combine to be helped, in securing art, education, pleasure and profit.

WANTS INFORMATION OF TOOTS.

Edgar Hamilton, stage manager of the Alvin Theater, Chattanooga, Tenn., advises the Moving Picture World that, while playing that theater on April 4th to 6th, one F. E. Toots, traveling with the "101 Ranch Picture," carried away with him one of that theater's regular films. Mr. Hamilton has been unable to locate Mr. Toots, but would like to get information concerning his whereabouts.

Motion Pictures and Patriotism.

By S. Whitney Todd.

RECENT photoplays have drawn largely upon the resources of American history, during the past centuries, for their exploitation. Nothing has been more common than the Civil War drama in pictures, with its wonderful scenes and dramatic situations of heartrending interest. The American soldier is a splendid, rugged picture of a modern warrior and there never has been the slightest suggestion of caricature in any motion picture exploitation of patriotic themes. In fact, no opportunity is permitted to go by without an effort to stimulate patriotism and love for country, which is inherent in the breast of every true citizen.

As the motion picture has gone back even to the time of the Druids and the Fall of Troy for its subjects, the early days of the American Republic and the Revolutionary War have easily been revived for the benefit of photoplay audiences. But the cause of Liberty and of Columbia are never forgotten and patriotism is the dominant theme of this visible recollection of the early history of the country. In fact, the mere choice of these subjects, though they have dramatic purposes of their own, is significant as to the patriotism, which they are sure to arouse. The motion picture, like every instrument of the people, the press for instance, brings the minds of these heterogeneous audiences back to their government and to matters which are of the greatest moment to the country.

And as an instrument for aiding this love of country, for quieting the discontented, who fly the flag of riot and ruin at the expense of their country, the motion picture is loyally strengthening the bonds of affection. Watch a typical photoplay audience while a patriotic picture play is on the screen. With the American eagle triumphant, the patriotism of the spectators is brought to the highest pitch. They applaud with enthusiasm and they go home, glad that they are citizens of a great and enlightened republic and eager to help perpetuate its fair name.

The motion picture has also assisted in its patriotic work by presenting before the people the president of the country in many of the most striking of his duties, as the chief executive of the land. Only recently President Taft posed before the motion picture camera and in this way he will become more familiar to the people of the country than if he had made a personal tour of every town and city in every state and had been thus brought to the personal view of every one of his fellow citizens. Other heads of the government have come before the eye of the motion picture camera. Great governmental events and works like that of the Panama Canal have been placed before the eyes of more people in each state than the comparative few who either conduct their business with the government and its representatives or are the officially invited guests, at any of the important government functions.

In all this, the motion picture has been especially useful as a patriotic agent. It has deepened the love for liberty and quickened the spirit of patriotism all over the land. And in the future the motion picture may be expected to be on the right side of law and order, to show each crime only to illustrate the retribution which lawbreaking always brings. Certainly the motion picture is helping to mold the minds of the people and to make their love of their country and their duties as its citizens more apparent and enthusiastic than ever before in the history of the country.

CINCINNATI MAYOR FAVORS PICTURE HOUSES.

New provisions for the amendment of the building code of Cincinnati, Ohio, relative to the regulation of moving picture theaters are being incorporated in a tentative ordinance under preparation for submission to Mayor Hunt and the city council by the moving picture theater proprietors. A delegation of local Union No. 2 of the Nation Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, headed by President A. Neff, called on the mayor.

At their representations, the mayor agreed to issue ninety-day licenses to all theaters whose licenses expire pending the action of council on the proposed ordinance, unless the violations of the present building code are such as to endanger the safety of audiences.

Mr. Neff told the mayor that if the code were rigorously enforced many theaters would be eliminated on technicalities, especially theaters which existed when the code was issued.

The mayor issued a ninety-day permit to the Liberty Street Theater, whose license expired recently.

Break in Ranks of Sales Company.

Under date of May 14, 1912, the following telegram was sent to all Independent exchanges in the United States and Canada:

> "The Film Supply Company of America, temporary office seven East Fourteenth Street, have secured the exclusive agency for the following brands of Independent films, making a total of twenty-one reels. Kindly place your standing order for any or all of these brands with us for shipment on and after May twenty-seventh as they will no longer be shipped through the Sales Company after that date. To obviate confusion wire your cancellation to Sales Company at the same time you place standing order with us. For the present release dates remain as usual:
> "Thanhouser, Gaumont, American, Great Northern, Reliance, Eclair, Solax, Majestic, Lux, Comet.
> "Address orders:
> "FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF AMERICA,
> "7 East Fourteenth Street."

This is the first definite announcement that has been made by the combined manufacturing interests which have been quietly getting together for the past month or two. The announcement is unqualified and unexplained by those interested, except by these two paragraphs in a letter to the Independent exchanges which followed the telegram:

> "It is our intention to supply this adequate and high class program to exchanges of good standing using our brands. Prices per foot remain the same as heretofore.
> "We intend to arrange exclusive territory as soon as it is practical to do so. We believe your best interests will be preserved by the use of this program of unquestioned quality."

The moving spirit or, more properly, the promoter of the Film Supply Company of America is Mr. H. E. Aitken, for a long time manager of the Western Film Exchange of St. Louis and New York, and more recently a prominent stockholder and director of the Reliance, the Majestic and other picture manufacturing concerns. Back of Mr. Aitken and his associates is said to be a number of Western financiers of large means, and it is declared that all the capital necessary to swing the big proposition undertaken by Mr. Aitken will be forthcoming as it is needed.

Beyond this general statement Mr. Aitken declined to say anything for publication at this time. The action of the concerns whose names are appended to the above-mentioned telegram constitute a definite break in the ranks of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, which organization has been the clearing house for the Independent manufacturers for the past two years.

Organizing Exchange Business.

Along with the movement of the manufacturers combined under the Film Supply Company of America goes the organization known as the Mutual Film Corporation. This is an exchange proposition promoted by the same persons. Its headquarters are in the Harris Trust Building, Chicago, and the concern is under the general management of Mr. J. R. Freuler, who was for a long time proprietor of a big exchange business in Milwaukee, Wis. This concern is capitalized at $2,500,000 and has for its purpose the acquisition of Independent exchanges throughout the United States. Already a number of exchanges have been acquired by the Mutual, but the exact number has not yet been given out for publication. General Manager Freuler has been in New York for the past week, and when asked by a representative of the Moving Picture World to explain the policy of the Mutual, he said:

"It is our purpose to put the exchange business on a proper basis as far as in our power to do so. We will not compel anyone to sell to us, but hope to guarantee exclusive territory to exchanges owned or controlled by us. Our first purpose will be to get rid of the junk film on the market and already I have succeeded in putting eight junk exchanges out of business, and have called in many thousand feet of junk film owned or controlled by us.

"Our next purpose will be to secure quality and you can take it from me that our own manufacturers will have to stand the test on that point. To insure a quality a better price must be paid for pictures and we do not care how high it goes if we get the results. We are not out for cheap film and do not want it. We will have a Feature Department and have already purchased the business of the F. & E. Company, whose offices are in Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago."

The offices of the Film Supply Company of America are at No. 7 East Fourteenth Street, New York.

Present Status of Sales Co.

Still remaining in the Sales Company are the New York Motion Picture Company, the Imp Films Company, the Powers Picture Plays, the Rex Motion Picture Company, the Champion Film Company, the Republic Film Company and the Nestor Films Company. Of these concerns, the first four named have formed an organization called the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Charles Baumann is president; P. A. Powers, vice-president, and Carl Laemmle is treasurer. It has been explained unofficially that this company is merely a protective organization formed by the four firms composing it as a sort of pool of interests. It is explained that the organization has absolutely no bearing upon the Sales Company and that its members will continue to release their pictures through the Sales Company as heretofore. At present the members of the Universal are actively engaged in securing allegiance on the part of Independent exchanges to the Sales Company. For that purpose Mr. Baumann, Mr. Powers and Mr. Laemmle attended an important meeting of exchange men in Chicago on Wednesday, May 15th. Regarding this meeting the Chicago representative of the Moving Picture World sends the following report:

Special to the Moving Picture World.

Chicago, Ill., May 15.—A meeting of the committee of three exchange men, appointed at Pittsburgh recently to draught plans and suggest ways and means to secure exclusive programs and exclusive territory on behalf of forty-nine Independent exchanges in the United States was held in the Sherman House to-day. The committee of three is composed of Joseph Hopp, Chicago; V. R. Carrick, Philadelphia, and W. E. Greene, Boston. This meeting was held to further the plans outlined at the recent meeting held in New York. The following exchange men were present: I. W. McMahon, of the Buckeye Film Exchange, Cincinnati; B. H. Powell, United Motion Picture Company, Oklahoma City; C. E. Olson, Wichita Film & Supply Co., Wichita, Kan.; John W. Morgan, Morgan Film Service, Kansas City, Mo.; W. E. Greene, Greene Film Exchange, Boston, and who represented Boston Film Exchange; V. R. Carrick, representing four exchanges in Philadelphia, one in Washington, one in Baltimore and one in Wilkesbarre, Pa.; H. A. Fitzjarrel, representing the Consolidated Film & Supply Co., of Atlanta, Ga., and New Orleans, La., and the Texas Film Exchange, of Dallas, Tex.; P. A. Powers, representing the Rex, Albany, N. Y., Victor, Buffalo, N. Y., and Cleveland O., Toledo Film Exchange, Toledo, O., and Central, Indianapolis, Ind.; I. Wagner, of the Swanson-Crawford Film Co., St. Louis; C. E. Plough, Anti-Trust Film Co., Chicago; Maurice Fleckles, representing the Laemmle Exchanges in Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha and Des Moines, and Joseph Hopp, representing the Standard Exchanges in Louisville and Chicago. F. E. Bailey, of Butte, and Mr. Crombacher, of Portland, Ore., representing the Montana Film Exchange, Butte, Spokane Film Exchange, Pacific Film Exchange, of Seattle, and the Independent Film Exchange, of Portland, did not arrive until ten o'clock in the evening.

The Universal Company of Manufacturers was represented by Charles Baumann, president; P. A. Powers, vice-president, and Carl Laemmle, treasurer. Mr. H. Blache, of the Gaumont and Solax Co.'s, was also present. It was not a joint meeting of the exchange men's committee of three and the officers of the Universal, as the latter did not engage in the consultations, being present rather for the purpose of conference with the committee if called upon and to make clear the plans prepared by the Universal to meet the requirements of Exchange men.

Most of the time was consumed by the exchange men in arranging exclusive territory for each exchange. Those in the same territory got together and agreed on the boundaries. In case of a disagreement, the committee of three was called into arbitrate and make final decision.

It should be distinctly understood that these exchange men fixed the various territories without the intervention or dictation of officers of the Universal. The forty-nine exchanges demand such territory with programs of uniform merit and quality from the Universal and the Universal has been formed to meet the requirements. How the latter intends doing it will be treated of in my next letter.

The committee of three will do some considerable traveling in order to assign exclusive territory to exchanges throughout the country. Within a week the members will visit another central city and meet all the exchange men in that section. The latter will agree among themselves as to the boundaries and if disagreement arises the committee will decide. The Universal Co. at present includes the Rex, Imp, Bison, Powers, Champion, Nestor, Ambrosio, and Itala. It is the expressed avowal of the Universal to take into the fold any or all of the remaining Independent manufaceurers, but they must be governed by that company's policy and regulations. The Universal will begin to operate in about thirty days, or within that time.

"The Lady of the Lake."

New Vitagraph Subject the First of a Series of Big Features in Store for Licensed Exhibitors.

IT is fitting that one of the greatest of landscape painters in poetry, Sir Walter Scott, should be accorded a place in the gallery of our New Art for a poem laid among scenes of surpassing beauty, and I do not know of a work of his that holds more closely to the highest ideals of a verbal delineation, now revitalized by this recent Vitagraph production, than "The Lady of the Lake." Late one summer I was in the neighborhood of Loch Katrine, had more than one glimpse of the lake and surrounding scenery and I can praise with authority as well as sincerity the choice of exteriors made for this three-reel photoplay.

The selection made is perfect, but the use made of it is not always so satisfactory. When we are given a far-reaching view of the stretch of water so enchanting, to the sentinel mountains behind it, "so wondrous wild, the whole might seem the scenery of a fairy dream," but many of the exteriors that could have been comprehensively grand are too limited in scope. With such an opportunity within easy reach, the director should have laid the action so as to give us other glimpses of the lake whenever and wherever it was possible and consistent. The beautiful expanse in the pictured story like that of the poem, has an infinite variety that never stales.

Someone of good judgment indicated a body of water in this country that admirably suited the text of the poem and grandly responded to all the requirements of the romantic photodrama, and it is obvious in the title that its constant use in sylvan scenes is demanded, but the eternal misdirector stands in our way—he seems afraid to give us too much of a good thing. It might have seemed commonplace enough to the man on the spot, but the audience is not there, and wherever beauty of exterior is accessible, especially where, as in this case, it is demanded, there is no such thing as showing it in too great a variety.

Our eyes never tire of natural loveliness growing out of the proximity of wooded hills to sheets of water—the picture has a charm of its own and suggests many more to our senses—especially when great masses of tender green surround the dimpling water and far-distant mountains lift their heads to the clouds of vapor riding gracefully above them. There is something about natural beauty in the gentler relations of land and water that soothes while it invigorates, that brings us into restful recognition of how close we are to our biding place, and causes us to feel our intimate connection with the universe.

The Lake of the Lady is a source of refreshing delight in itself and so impresses a Stranger who appears on the scene, a Hunter, as Scott tells the story, who "hied his way to join some comrades of the day, yet often paused, so strange the road, so wondrous were the scenes it showed." A Stranger! The poet knows better than the dramatist-ordinary that an air of mystery heavily contributes to preliminary interest. This Stranger-Huntsman stands on a promontory and gazes enraptured at the lovely scene, himself a noble and dominant figure in it, then sounds his horn.

Lo! forth starting at the sound comes Edith Storey in a little skiff—she makes a very pretty Lady of the Lake and does her part with intelligent dignity and natural charm—and rows to the spot where the Stranger-Huntsman stands concealed. Upon landing near him she pauses "with head upraised and look intent, and eye and ear attentive bent, and locks flung back, and lips apart, like monument of Grecian art." "Father!" she calls. The Huntsman remains in hiding a moment to study her before disclosing himself—she, too, is a mystery. "Her satin snood, her silken plaid, her golden brooch such birth betrayed, a chieftian's daughter seemed the maid."

Scott invests these characters with obscurity, instead of telling us all about them, to arouse curiosity and thus grips interest from the outset, while he proceeds with his artistic development of the story to the dramatic scenes. He writes with as much surity as a motion-picture playwright working on assignment, but the poet-novelist-historian is a master of his medium, chooses instinctively the right method and has something to say. I speak of him as though he was still with us because his spirit really is—we live as long as our works. He presents us with an encounter between two people of significant importance, yet unknown to each other, of opposite sexs and amid romantic surroundings.

The Stranger is a striking figure. Middle age has made its impress on his bold visage, yet had not quenched its youth. "Forward and frolic glee was there, the will to do, the soul to dare, the sparkling glance, soon blown to fire, of hasty love or headlong ire." "His ready speech flowed fair and free, in phrase of gentlest courtesy, yet seemed that tone and gesture bland less suited to sue than to command." The impressive Stranger and the Lady of the Lake are the two central figures of the story, the working out of their destinies is the life of the piece, and Scott not only teaches a lesson in solving the problem but gives us abundant food for thought in his handling of the subject.

Scene from "The Lady of the Lake" (Vitagraph).

The Stranger who falls under the spell of Ellen's youthful beauty is James V. of Scotland, a monarch of noble intentions, who often went among his subjects disguised in order to conserve the interests of the common people. While occupied in seeing that justice was done those most oppressed in his domains, he naturally came upon some enlivening adventures. Of powerful physique, a master of weapons and brave to the point of recklessness, he more than once endangered his life in desperate personal encounters. He could fall victim to the spell of beauty quite as promptly as the rest of us do, which goes to show that he was very much of a man.

King James in the photoplay, announces to Edith (known in the poem as "Ellen"), that he has strayed from his companions and is without shelter. Edith knows a real man from an actor and ferries him across to an island where her father, Douglas, the outlawed Earl of Angus, is hiding from the wrath of his sovereign, in the haunt of a Brigand Chief named Roderick Dhu. The latter is absent with his clan and Douglas is hunting on the mainland. The King enters the house of the outlaws boldly enough, but is startled by the fall of a great sword from its hangings and half recognizes it as that of Douglas.

However tender the clasp of Edith's hand, the purity and courage of her soul holds the King's warm suit and high hopes in abeyance—the phantom of Douglas is ever present—and the adventurous monarch retires to restlessly sleep and dream. In the morning he parts from her and returns to the main shore. Edith, beloved by Malcolm Graeme and Roderick Dhu, sighed and smiled at the parting. Though quite as much a woman as James is a man, she is excused by the poet for loitering until the last. "Forgive, forgive, Fidelity!" "Perchance the maiden chanced to see yon parting lingerer wave adieu, and stop and turn to wave anew; and, lovely ladies, ere your ire condemn the heroine of my lyre, show me the fair would scorn to spy and prize such conquest of her eye!"

The King comes back, but not until Roderick Dhu and Malcolm Graeme are at sword's points over fascinating Edith and the whole of Clan Alpine is roused in arms to battle with the constituted authorities—a little habit of the Scotch. The clan gathers near a strange and wild retreat known as the Goblin's Cave, a sacrifice is made, a groom leaves his bride, a mourning son the burial procession of his father, there are great preparations for war when James Fitz-James penetrates the hostile lines, single-handed, to once more woo the Lady of the Lake, and, being a true hero, he is an ardent lover.

THE LADY:—"O stranger! in such hour of fear
"What evil hap has brought thee here?"

THE KING:—"Sweet Ellen, dear my life must be,
"Since it is worthy care from thee;
"Yet life I hold but idle breath
"When love or honor's weighed with death.
"Then let me profit by my chance,
"And speak my purpose bold at once.
"I come to bear thee from a wild
"Where ne'er before such blossom smiled,
"By this soft hand to lead thee far
"From frantic scenes of feud and war.
"Near Bochastle my horses wait;
"They bear us soon to Stirling gate.
"I'll place thee in a lovely bower,
"I'll guard thee like a tender flower——"

Like a true-hearted Scottish lass, she refuses to purchase all that would make life beautiful and lead to the restoration of those now in disgrace at the price of her own dishonor. Instead, she tells the truth concerning her father's exile and reveals that she is pledged to the one who shared it for her sake, Malcolm Graeme. Her sincerity and courage shame the royal suitor; hope vanishes from his heart, but sympathy replaces it. With true magnanimity he gives her a ring which he claims to have received from the King on the occasion of saving the latter's life and states that it carries a pledge—any recompense the bearer of it may name.

James comes upon murderous Roderick Dhu and his crew and a deadly combat ensues in one of the most spirited scenes of the drama. They begin with sword play that leads to the bandit's discomfiture and finally close in a test of strength rather than skill with weapons, but Roderick is brought to his knees. He dashes back, seizes the King's throat in a throttling grip and bears him to the ground. He draws his dagger and attempts to strike, but exhaustion diverts the blow, the King is saved and Roderick meets defeat in the fairest struggle ever given by sovereign to one of his subjects.

To end the strife, conducted for his sake, Douglas at last yields himself at Stirling castle. Ellen goes in quest of him and appears in the final scene, a well-designed ensemble, as a suppliant, guided by the one she supposes to be James Fitz-James, the King in youthful disguise.

"Within t'was brilliant all and light,
"A thronging scene of figures bright;
"It glowed on Ellen's dazzled sight,"
"Then slow her drooping head she raised,
"And fearful round the presence gazed
"For him she sought who owned the state,
"The dreaded Prince whose will was fate."

She turns bewildered from one to another—every head in the room is bare save that of Fitz-James and all looks are bent upon him—then it dawns upon her that the knight who so ardently courted her is Scotland's King, and she sinks down on her knees before him to plead the cause of her father and of her lover, both of whom have set at defiance the royal commands. The culprits are brought in, Douglas is pardoned, and Fitz-James has redeemed the signet ring in his true guise as King. There remains the lover, Malcolm. The King casts a chain over the latter's head—it is his own gold chain—and lays the clasp in the hands of The Lady of the Lake.

The play ends nobly and artistically. The generous monarch's face is turned away from those he has made supremely happy, and the workings of his mind can be plainly seen. Perhaps he is sighing:

"Fainter and fainter down the rugged dell
"Receding now, the dying numbers ring.
"And now the mountain breezes scarcely bring "A wandering witch-note of the distant spell——
"And now 'tis silent all!—Enchantress, fare thee well!"

"The Orleans Coach."

An Unusually Strong and Artistic Feature Subject by Pathe Freres—in Three Reels.

A PERIOD play if well done in moving pictures is one of the most acceptable of any. There are not many period plays that can be considered absolutely correct in all detail. It is a pleasure to come across a faultless period picture, and, "The Orleans Coach" is surely one of these. We have called it a play. Perhaps that is not exactly the best way to style it. The subject matter is neither a play nor history, but is taken from a well-known episode in the judicial annals of France during the year 1795. It is a pictured version of a great legal mistake, the story of which has been told in words many, many times, and thousands of French men and women have dropped a tear at the thought of the sad fate of an honorable man who died on the guillotine, not for any crime he had committed, but because he looked like the man who did.

The fate of Roussel (Jean Lesurtues) is as well known to the average Frenchman as the fate of Alexander Hamilton is known to the average American. The film story is not obliged to rely on imagination in the way of a plot. The great dramatic essentials were all present in most perfect array at the time that Roussel was condemned to die through circumstantial evidence. In producing "The Orleans Coach," the Pathe Company has imbedded the facts of the case into the most perfect conception of character and period as is possible to be done. The principal thread running through the story is that of a resemblance between two men. The principal actor in the picture therefore, enacts a dual role. When one is aware that the incidents depicted really occurred, the picture has an influence over one that really seems like looking back into the past a hundred years. It is not difficult for anyone to imagine that he has been transported back for that space of time. Without knowing the story to be true it would perhaps be equally as gripping.

The double part of "Roussel," the merchant, and "Gasnier," the robber, are played by M. M. Ravet. His work is perfect so far as he is concerned, but he is greatly assisted by wonderful camera work in the matter of double exposures and quick change stops. In a number of pictures Monsieur Ravet steps out of a picture as "Roussel," only to immediately appear, following himself, as "Gasnier." An audience will scarcely notice this, but such works require that all other characters in the scene must stand as motionless as statues while the actor is changing from one character to the other. Good work along this line is becoming rather scarce lately. After a camera stop the actor seldom resumes the same position accurately. Nine times out of ten the break shows distinctly on the screen. In "The Orleans Coach," Pathe Freres have done wonderfully well in this particular, there being no stops perceptible. One of the double exposure scenes is wonderfully well done, showing concerted action timed accurately to the second, taking place in both halves of the picture. In a restaurant scene M. Ravet as Gasnier, the robber, is drinking at a table when Nickolet enters with M. Ravet as Roussel. Some pantomine indicating recognition between Nickolet and Gasnier is so well simulated that the trick will never be detected by any audience in the world. There is absolutely no line of demarcation to give away the double exposure.

Roussel was a merchant of Paris, respected and wealthy. His daughter was engaged to a worthy young man and life for all of them held more happiness than sorrow. Roussel's father was an old man who kept a wayside inn on the stage route to Orleans. Roussel occasionally visited his father and sometimes offered him money, as the old man was not earning much money and lived a humble life. The old fellow, though poor, was proud and did not depend upon his son, nor would he accept the money when offered. On a certain day Roussel was going to make a journey to see his father. Before departing he took supper at a restaurant with his daughter and the young man she was to marry. They were a jolly little party during the meal. Seated nearby was a good-humored but eccentric gentleman who made their acquaintance easily on account of his drolleries. This man whose name was Nickolet was a sly crook. He was waiting for some kind of prey at the time of meeting Roussel and the others. Nothing seemed propitious to his schemes, however, until there entered the restaurant a swaggering adventurer who, in face and form, was the exact counterpart of Roussel. Roussel by this time had gone on his way to a livery stable to hire a horse with which to make his journey. Meanwhile in the restaurant, Nickolet had noticed the remarkable resemblance between Roussel and Gasnier. As water seeks its level, and as birds of a feather flock together, so Nickolet and Gasnier, though both strangers to each other, had gotten together and hatched up a scheme within fifteen minutes.

That night the Orleans coach was to carry from Paris a huge sum of money destined to Napoleon's Army in Italy. The robbers' scheme was to attack the coach and get the money, after which it was their intention to fasten the crime upon Roussel. Roussel had made his visit to his father's inn where the Orleans coach would stop that night. But Roussel left for Paris earlier in the night and returned the hired horse to the stable in Paris. When the stage coach arrived at the inn the bandits were there, four in number, and began their attack on the coach, after which they turned in and robbed the hotel. Gasnier was the leader of the gang and to Roussel's old father and the servant boy it surely appeared that the old man's son was robbing him, after having killed the stage driver.

Scene from First Reel of "The Orleans Coach" (Pathe).

An investigation of the crime followed. The old man appeared before the judge and testified against his own son, as did also the servant boy. Roussel with one of the bandits, who dropped a whip with his name on it, was sentenced to die on the guillotine. The record of the hired horse bid fair to establish an alibi for Roussel, but Gasnier learning this broke into Roussel's home by night and destroyed the record. On the way to the guillotine the bandit confessed and declared that Roussel was innocent and that Gasnier was the guilty man. Gasnier had hired a room in a hotel facing the public square where the executions were to take place. He got a warning that the police were coming and made his escape from the room from which he had intended to witness the execution. By this delay the condemned man lost his life. Through the open window of Gasnier's room the deadly knife was seen to descend and put an end to the life of Roussel.

Final Scene of "The Orleans Coach" (Pathe).

The part of Nickolet was masterfully played by M. Treville and deserves especial mention. The scenes in the picture are nearly all taken at the exact locations where the tragedy occurred over a hundred years ago. H. F. H.

Folk Ordinance Held Up.

Board of Aldermen Send It Back to the Committee on Laws and Resolutions Because of Omission of a Phrase.

WHEN the Folk Ordinance for the regulation of motion picture theaters came up for consideration in the New York Board of Aldermen Tuesday, May 14, the discovery was made that the phrase, "Be it enacted," had been omitted from the printed draft, whereupon the measure was sent back to the Committee on Laws and Resolutions for amendment. While this is given as the reason for the hold-up, it is stated that the real reason was that the supporters of the measure lacked the necessary number of votes to pass it and did not care to submit it to a vote in the face of almost certain defeat. The opposition to the passage of the ordinance comes from the Tammany members of the board, believed to be supporting the claims of the legitimate theatrical interests and of the Sullivans, who are deeply interested in maintaining the status quo.

Commenting upon the attitude of certain reformers toward the Folk Ordinance, the New York Evening Sun of May 14 printed the following pertinent editorial:

REGULATING THE MOVING PICTURE SHOWS.

It appears that the Women's Municipal League and the Society for the Prevention of Crime are strongly opposed to Alderman Folks's ordinance for the regulation of moving-picture theatres, on the ground that it does not in any way provide for the censorship of films. We may take it for granted that it is equally opposed by many persons concerned in the management of such theatres, though for a very different reason. The important point to be considered with regard to the hearing to-day is whether the measure is desirable as far as it goes. The question of censorship is another one with which the Folks ordinance has little to do. It may possibly be desirable, as some believe, to establish a more rigid control over the pictures exhibited; but even if it is, the fact has no obvious bearing upon the merits of the main points of the Folks ordinance.

There are at present about six hundred moving-picture theatres in this city, at which the daily average attendance is said to amount to about 300,000. Many of these theatres are unsanitary and unsafe. Under the present law there is no practical way of controlling the smaller houses, though many of them are notoriously unfit for their purpose. The principal object of the Folks ordinance is apparently to establish a greater degree of safety in these places; it provides for municipal supervision of the lighting, heating and ventilating arrangements and is intended to secure safer construction and adequate means of exit in case of fire or panic. No one who has visited some of the smaller theatres can fail to realize that the present regulations are scandalously inadequate or doubt that in the event of a fire many lives would be lost.

The supervision of films is of secondary importance beside the supervision of the buildings where they are shown. The complaint that the present censors are under the control of the moving-picture men and that they have failed to suppress some films that ought to be suppressed does not in any way affect the question under consideration. If the present method of censorship is unsatisfactory let it by all means be amended; but the main thing at present is to make the theatres safe, to provide for sound construction, suitable regulations for the prevention of fire and adequate means of escape in case of accident.

The New York Times also urges the passage of the Folk ordinance.

EXPENSIVE THEATER AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The Lyric Theater, located at 133-139 North Illinois Street, Indianapolis, Ind., which is under course of construction, will be when completed a $75,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater. The place will be of fireproof material throughout and will be 73 feet by 120 feet in dimensions. The general construction will be of concrete, brick and steel. The exterior finish will be of artistic brick with white terra cotta trimmings. The lobby will be finished in marble and will be illuminated by a massive cluster of electric lights.

The interior furnishings of the theater will be elaborate throughout. The first and second balcony furnishings will be identical, and persons visiting the theater will have access to either floor. In fact everything that will insure the comfort of the public has been considered.

The Lyric is being built by the Central Amusement Company, which is composed of Messrs. B. B. Barton, Jesse M. Barton, and Charles M. Olson. The house is expected to be opened by August 15.

ESSANAY GETS KENTUCKY DERBY.

The great Kentucky Derby, run at Louisville, Saturday, May 11, will figure prominently in a forthcoming dramatic subject from the Essanay Company. Essanay had a producer and camera man on the ground and excellent scenes of the race were secured, together with glimpses of the enormous crowd, the stables and other views. With these on hand, Essanay is already busily preparing a sensational racing drama that will undoubtedly prove the greatest film of its kind ever made. Nothing is more exciting to view than a good horserace, and no subject offers more splendid possibilities for live thrills and enthusiasm than the closely huddled bunch of thoroughbreds turning into the stretch for the final heartbreaking dash under the wire.

"For the Good of Her Men"

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

THE American Western Company has produced a rather unusual film, "For the Good of Her Men," that will be released Monday, June 10. I mean unusual in story, for it is not often that one hears of a woman giving her husband and two sons into the arms of the law, in order to save them from themselves, when she knows that the penalty means many years in the penitentiary. Notwithstanding its improbability, however, the story has a strong grip and is well told in the pictures.

The settings are laid in an arid spot in southern California, so that nothing picturesque can be claimed for the scenes. The photography lacked detail in some places, in the print viewed by me, but it may have been due to overdevelopment in that particular print (the first one made). The acting is commendable and the atmosphere of the Southwest, in which the incidents take place, is faithfully reflected. Warren Kerrigan is always a manly lover, and the love scenes in which Miss Bush participates as Mabel Jessup, are drawn with nice delicacy and sentiment. The sheriff's posse, employed in the final scenes, is certainly typical of the locality, and if one sees a great deal of shooting without any damage on either side, it must be attributed to fear of the film censor and not to a lack of realistic acting or poor marksmanship.

Zeke Jessup and his two stalwart sons run a still in Old Mexico and smuggle their product across the line. His wife and daughter, Mabel, mourn over the dangerous and illegal calling of their loved ones; and the mother is especially grieved as she watches the inroad made by strong drink on the lives of her sons. She pleads with her husband to give up the illicit traffic and with her sons to foreswear the drinking habit, but without avail. Her boys even laugh at her solicitude for their welfare and grow still more sottish and more defiant of the law.

Mabel gets acquainted with Tom Beverly, a young and prosperous ranchman of clean life and habits. They meet often and mutual esteem soon ripens into love. Mabel invites him to her home, where he is warmly welcomed by her mother. The elder Jessup and the boys resent the intrusion, as they fear it will lead to the disclosure of their unlawful occupation. The climax comes when Zeke Jessup rudely orders Beverly from the premises. Mabel follows him and assures him of her unchanging devotion.

This incident causes Mrs. Jessup to carry out a plan that she had thought of for some time to save her husband and boys from filling drunkards' graves. Any disgrace will be better than that, she tells herself, and we see her on her way to the sheiff to disclose the secret of their wrongdoing.

That officer, on learning the truth, immediately assembles a posse and they ride away to arrest the lawbreakers. On nearing the Jessup homestead they meet Beverly, and the sheriff, suspecting him of complicity in the smuggling operations, forces him to serve as a deputy.

Jessup and his sons discover the approach of the sheriff and his men and open fire on them. A running fight takes place as the father and his sons flee to the barn for refuge. The sheriff orders Beverly to go to the door and command them to surrender at pistol point. Seeing no chance of escape and nothing but death in resistance, the Jessups come out with hands up.

Mabel, who had said goodbye to her lover only a few minutes before, arrives and rushes to her father's arms. She looks at Beverly with horror, believing him guilty of betraying her people, and heaps reproaches on him. He listens in speechless astonishment and pain, while her father and brothers add their curses to her charge of cowardice.

But the mistake is soon to be made right. Mrs. Jessup appears on the scene and confesses that she had betrayed them to the sheriff. Husband and sons bow their heads in despair as she tells them that she did it for the good of her men, and that life in prison was preferable to the degraded lives they had been leading.

As the officers depart with their prisoners, mother and daughter are bowed in grief and helplessness. They are roused by the voice of Tom Beverly saying, "I'll take care of you till they come back."

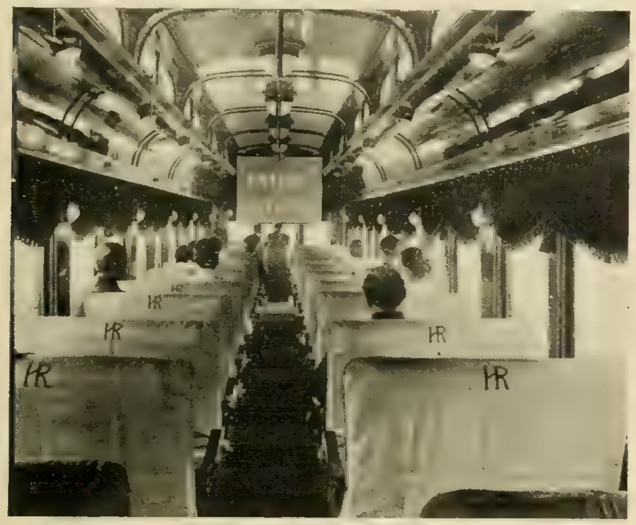
Novel Use of Pictures.

Interurban Railway Company Installs Projecting Machine In "Party Car" With Pleasing Effect.

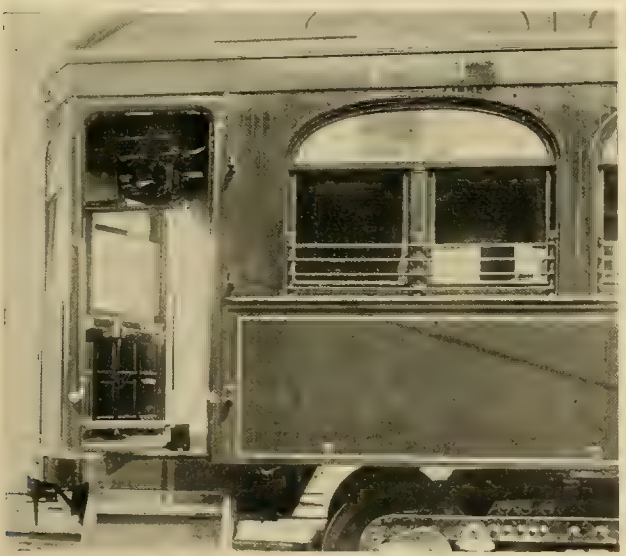
Moving pictures have found their way into a new channel, this time being used by street railway managers for the entertainment of passengers who charter private cars for long runs. The Pittsburgh, Harmony, Butler and New Castle Railway Company, with general offices in the Diamond National Bank Building, Pittsburgh, Pa., and whose lines extend from Pittsburgh to Butler thence to New Castle, Pa., is the first road to use the moving picture machine.



Interior View of Car, Showing Screen.

The "Party car," in which the first machine has been installed, is a rebuilt car, for this piece of equipment was badly damaged by being in a wreck not many months ago. When the car was rebuilt, General Superintendent Harry Etheridge conceived the idea that a "Party car" with a moving picture equipment would be a new traffic producer.

When the matter was given serious consideration, it resulted in the most modern motion picture machine on the market being bought and installed in the rebuilt car, it being attached to the inside of the roof on the rear platform.



Showing Machine in Vestibule.

A small platform three feet square was built and high enough for the operator to stand upon to work the machine. When the trip is ended, the platform is lifted out of the way of passengers alighting from the car.

The screen is in the front of the car, and directly back of the motorman. This is lifted and lowered just as a blind is in the home. It also serves as a "blind" for the motorman, no light penetrating through the screen, thus giving the motorman a clear vision with the headlight of the car.

The electric lights in the car are turned out after the trip has been started, and all is ready to start the reel. Window curtains are drawn, and the car then resembles a cozy theater on wheels.

Two reels of pictures are shown and these reels are never repeated. Reels of the longest length are demanded by the company, for the longest trip the car makes is about two hours—this while being operated as a special between New Castle and Pittsburgh.

When the car is returned to the barn after the return trip at night, the reels are forwarded to Pittsburgh on the first car the following day. When the car is to go out again, an advance order is sent to a Pittsburgh film exchange, and new subjects are then sent to the company.

It frequently happens that the company is compelled to send out two special cars on order for private parties, frequently 100 or more passengers forming theater parties from New Castle and Butler to Pittsburgh. On the trip from New Castle to Pittsburgh, say 50 of the party use the "party picture car" on the "going trip" and then the pictures are "run." Then on the return trip, those who rode in the regular special car change places with those who rode in the "party car" and for their benefit the pictures are "run" on the return trip.

The "party car" is becoming a most popular feature with the company, and is now in demand practically five nights out of a week. It is handsomely furnished, clean white linen being placed over the back of the high seats every time the car is chartered. The appointments of the car are perfect. Lunch and card tables are at the command of the passengers on the "Party car," individual electric lamps being placed on each card table and at each seat for this purpose.

A GOOD JUDGE OF GOOD PICTURES.

George H. Hines, one of the oldest subscribers to the Moving Picture World and holder of the Motion Picture Patents Company's license No. 1, ought to qualify as a good judge of pictures. Mr. Hines has been operating picture theaters in Chicago for a long time and is now owner and manager of the Lyda Theater in that city. Here is what he has to say about a good picture:

> "Chicago, May 10th, 1912.
> "Editor Motion Picture World,
> "New York City.
> "My Dear Sir—In my past nine years as an exhibitor I have never taken the liberty of recommending a picture, as I have always been more than pleased with the Association pictures. But yesterday I had the pleasure of showing Selig's 'Coming of Columbus,' and I have 1,000 seats and played a record business with 'Columbus,' so much so that I have to-day booked it back again. I never have seen, or run, a picture that has pleased my patrons as 'Columbus' has. This will prove a revelation to picturedom and I think the great success of 'Columbus' should greatly encourage other manufacturers to bring out big feature subjects. One or two special features will be appreciated and welcomed by all high class motion picture theaters every week. Success to the Selig Poliscope Company. Keep the good work up, as motion motion pictures are only in their infancy to-day. They are the pleasing amusement that is liked by all the amusement-going people. Nuf ced."

NEW THEATER FOR WINDSOR, ONTARIO, CAN.

The Builders' and Contractors' Association, of Essex, Thompson Building, Windsor, Ontario, Canada, advises us that one of its chief contractors, Mr. F. C. Poli, is starting to build one of the finest five-cent moving picture theaters in Windsor. The house will have a seating capacity of about 450 and all latest improvements and fittings will be made in it. Mr. Poli has built about thirty of the best showhouses for others in the city of Detroit, and has come to the conclusion that he wants a moving picture theater for himself.

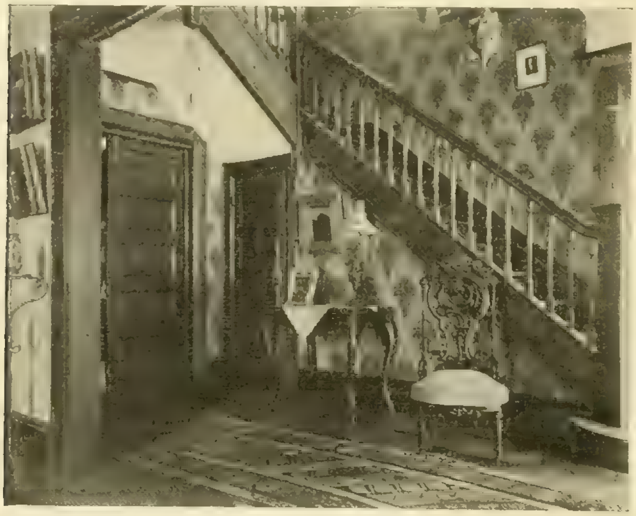
NEW OPEN AIRDOME ON BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Messrs. Harris & Goldston are equipping a fine open air show on Broadway, near 99th street. They purchased a Powers No. 6 M. P. machine from J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man." Mr. Hallberg reports the sale of an A. C. to D. C. Economizer 40 amp. size to W. C. Grau, Hopkinsville, Ky. A No. 6 Powers with full line of supplies to Earl & Carroll, Cornwall, N. Y. Many places are equipping their theaters with Hallberg A. C. Economizers, throwing out the cheaper devices on account of the better light produced by the Hallberg.

Restraint In Interior Decoration.

By Wray Bartlett Physioc.

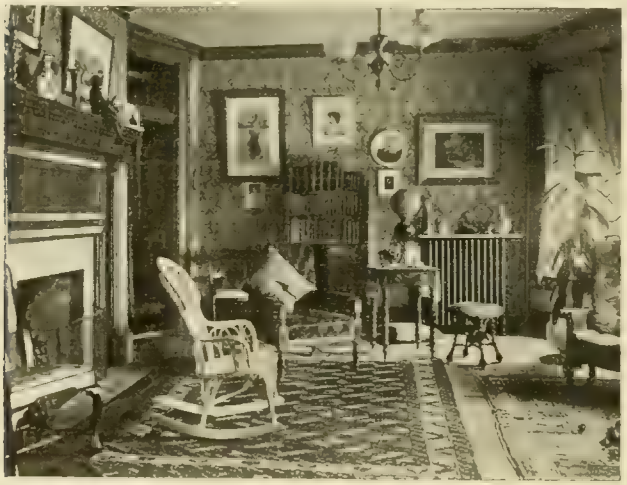
TOO often we see a scenic set in the moving pictures overcrowded with furniture and other household goods with certain expectations of getting an elaborate effect out of a very strictly limited area. It seems strange that we cannot all of us realize that simplicity and elegance go hand in hand when we understand by simplicity that crudity is never meant. Unfortunately most of the pictures we see are so overcrowded with properties of no artistic merit that the composition of the set suggests confusion and renders it completely at variance with any sense of proportion.



Treatment of Hall.

In the narrow strip of a passage which we dignify with the name of hall, there is not, as in the square halls of yore, much room for furniture. A table, a hat and umbrella stand, and a seat of some kind, are indispensable, and therefore they should be of as convenient size and description as possible. The photograph here given shows a hall table, a lamp and a chair. The form is simple, and the only ornament about the set is the delicate mouldings and simple stencil on the wall, so that it answers the purpose required of it.

Drapery, as a means of modifying the stiff and cold appearance of the entrance hall, is not made as much use of as it might be. Whenever it can be employed either as a portière over a door or across an archway, it will, if made of suitable material, and harmonizing in tone with the walls and woodwork, warm and lighten the set, and give it a much more dignified aspect.



A Drawing Room Effect.

In some of the moving pictures we have seen scenic sets representing a beautiful drawing-room in the "dado style," I think they call it, and the scenic artists's charming idea of having flowers painted on the panels of the doors, so beautifully done they were like real flowers. It should be explained to them that the rooms they describe do not appear to be arranged upon such decorative principles in this country, and some suggestions should then be offered for a mode of treatment in accordance with a more cultivated view of the principles of decorative art.

The drawing-room is the part of the house which is devoted to the lighter occupations of life: to the reception of visitors and to the enjoyment of those moments of post-prandial leisure in which we have mainly to consider the amusement of ourselves, our families and our friends. The general aspect of the room should be rather gay than grave, and hence it comes that custom has prescribed the use of lighter and more delicate forms of colors than are admissible elsewhere. But as there is a wrong as well as a right application of every principle, so out of this laudable desire to introduce a feeling of gaiety and to exclude all work-a-day thoughts, the modern drawing-room in the motion pictures displays a tawdry and theatrical style of decoration and furniture and an unsuccessful attempt at ease and elegance, which shows itself chiefly in a jumble of chairs and tables and an introduction of many ornaments, until both beauty and propriety are lost. In how few scenes do we find the evidence of any guiding principle in the arrangement of furniture and decoration, which appears the result of accident rather than of skill and contrivance; so that fitness—the one great source of beauty and composition—is altogether disregarded.

In a recent release of a motion picture I saw the walls of a drawing-room covered with ill-designed attempts at arabesque ornament and figures of nymphs and cherubs which would be more fittingly placed in the Eden Musee's chamber of horrors. Let the scenic artist be content with the simple styles of decoration when he can. We never see any Gothic halls, Elizabethan chambers or Louis Quatorze drawing-rooms in a Harlem flat. It is that pernicious habit of struggling to imitate that has done more than anything else to hurt interior settings. In modern houses we never see such decorations. The culture of æsthetic feelings is too generally neglected amongst us; so that little is known and still less is cared about the principles of decorative art.

LOOK OUT FOR "M. B. COOK."

The Moving Picture World desires to notify moving picture men and prospective subscribers, as far as possible, to beware of an alleged subscription agent who signs himself "M. B. Cook." We have received complaints from various sources to the effect that money has been paid "M. B. Cook" for subscriptions to the Moving Picture World. We also learn that the same individual frequently uses the aliases of "M. B. Briggs," "M. B. Brooks," "R. Sisson" and others, and sometimes styles himself the "Southern Subscription Agency." It is impossible for the World to guard against all the crooks in the subscription business, but would give this general advice to all, "Do not pay subscription money to any person unknown to you, who may represent himself to be a solicitor for the Moving Picture World." We have no solicitors in the field, but subscriptions may always be transmitted direct to this office, or through your newsdealer or some known subscription agent.

THE SUFFRAGISTS GO FILMING.

The Women's Political Union has stolen a march on other suffrage and anti-suffrage propagandists by "putting across" a remarkable argument in the form of a film-comedy, entitled, "Suffrage Wins Herbert." This is being produced by the Eclair Film Company, of Fort Lee, N. J., for release on June 7th, with the regular stock company, in addition to a large number of volunteers who are the leading spirits of the Woman's Political Union. The play is a romantic comedy by Miss Dorothy Steele, a well-known novelist and playwright, who is a member of the Political Union. As may be surmised from the title, it is based upon the love affair of a beautiful suffragist—and the volunteers from the ranks of the workers have proved that there are many such. The influence of the suffragist vote in the recent California election for the presidential primary has proved the remarkable increase in power which has been gained by the women's campaign in this country. Instead of breaking windows, the American suffragists have been breaking precedent by using every possible appeal,—and this of the moving picture play is an advance over the great parade which a few days ago caused a surprising enthusiasm throughout the country. Mrs. Blatch and all the other prominent leaders of the movement, as well as many famous men supporters of the cause, will be seen in the ensembles and important roles of the play. In having their cause put forth to the regular exhibition public by a powerful producing company like the Eclair, the suffragists have demonstrated that they are not lacking in that executive ability which they seek to crystallize into election-day power.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

AT the present writing, a split in the ranks of Independent manufacturers seems not only impending but inevitable. Those responsible for the conditions, it would appear, are more interested in the exploitation of selfish interests than in the future of the moving picture industry. That future is assured, however, no matter what obstacles may be confronted. It is only a question of time and the elimination of unfit factors.

The recent meeting of Independent exchange men and certain members of the Sales Company, in New York, resulted, it is said, in an amicable arrangement, which will be fully outlined when matters are perfected.

In the recent differences and clash of interests among Independent manufacturers, in which exchanges have also been involved, it seems to me that very scant consideration has been given the Independent exhibitor. He seems to have been left out of the equation; but no correct solution can be arrived at without him. It would be well to remember that he is also doing some tall thinking and that his voice will be heard in no unmistakable accent at the psychological moment. While two dogs quarrel, some other tyke usually gets away with the bone.

Editor Fornof's Tribute to Pictures.

John R. Fornof, editor of the Free Press, Streator, Ill., writes: "Enclosed find editorial which appeared in the Streator Free Press of May 1. It truly denotes the sentiment with which the moving pictures of to-day are being received.

The editorial, in part, is as follows: "Motion picture shows continue to gain in popular opinion, as is evidenced by the audiences which daily fill the theaters of this city. The popularity here is indicative of the popularity throughout the country. Film pictures in the beginning were accepted by the public with considerable misgivings. The subjects were of more or less questionable variety, for the managers believed that something spicy was necessary to attract the people. This was a temporary success, but it did not augur well for the permanency of the institution. Progressive managers, however, realized the trend of public opinion and immediately began to give shows of value. The clean, instructive and moral shows attracted a patronage that was impossible to secure with the earlier pictures. With the scenic pictures, the audience was transferred to the wonder scenes of the world. The person who is unable to travel thus has an opportunity to study the scenes and customs of the people in all parts of the globe, from the scenes of the busy city to the jungles of Darkest Africa.

"Great moral lessons have been vividly impressed upon the minds of people through the picturing of some problem. Many are thus able to receive a sermon, from which they can draw their own conclusions, when they would be unwilling to listen to an oral sermon. Unconsciously the motion pictures are working for a better and moral class. The pictures must be given credit for reaching people who cannot be reached in any other way. So great an influence have these passing shows had upon religion that the churches in the bigger cities are rapidly installing stereopticon machines, in view of influencing more people to the cause of righteous living."

Chicago Bars Pictures Showing Disorderly Mobs.

During the recent newspaper strike troubles in Chicago, an enterprising cameraman, supposed to represent the Gaumont Company, set his machine over the entrance of the Hartford Building, opposite the Tribune Building, and in a few minutes hundreds of boys and men gathered. Evidently wishing to give the cameraman a good picture, they began milling in the vicinity, pressing against the newsstands, jostling each other, and in various other ways giving a realistic scene of an incipient disturbance. The picture man smiled and nodded his approval of the fine action, as he turned his crank.

Meanwhile the attention of the city authorities was drawn to the matter and they at once agreed that the exhibition of moving pictures showing disturbances, riots and disorderly mobs would not be tolerated. Steps were immediately taken to have Section 1627, of Article III, Chapter XLVI, of the Chicago Code, amended to read as follows: "Improper pictures (permit not to be granted).—If a picture or series of pictures for the showing or exhibition of which an application for a permit is made, is improper, or portrays any riotous, disorderly or other unlawful scene, or has a tendency to disturb the public peace, it shall be the duty of the general superintendent of police to refuse such permit; otherwise it shall be his duty to grant such a permit." The amendment was referred to the committee on licenses, and was favorably voted for passage.

Of Interest to Chicago M. P. Operators.

Wm. H. Havill, city examiner of moving picture operators, has been appointed inspector of moving picture operating rooms in the city of Chicago. The appointment was made by City Electrician Palmer, at the request of a committee from the operators' union. This committee expressed the desire of the union to co-operate heartily with the city inspector, in seeing that the members were properly disciplined and that they complied with the laws and ordinances in the interest of safety.

Mr. Havill naturally feels complimented by the action of the operators' union, which has inspired him with confidence. He believes that earnest co-operation between the members of the union and himself will result in the general satisfaction of picture theatergoers as to safety.

The following bulletin has been issued by the board of examiners for the information of applicants for examination and apprentices for permits: "Notice is hereby given that on and after May 8th, 1912, the examiner of moving picture operators will transact such business as may be required from the board of examiners of moving picture operators, between the hours of 1 p. m. and 4 p. m. (except Saturday, which shall be from 10 a. m. till noon). All candidates for examination, so approved for such an examination, shall be examined at 1 p. m. on each Friday. All persons taking this examination must be listed not later than 4 p. m., on the day next preceding such examination to be held."

General Supt. of Police McWeeny has issued the following bulletin to commanding officers, regarding the noncompliance of Chicago moving picture operators with the law: "Complaint is made to me that there are numerous violations of the ordinances governing moving picture shows and that many of the machines are being operated by men and boys who have never secured a license as operator, as provided by the Chicago Code of 1911.

"You will instruct all officers of your command as follows:

"1. See that the operator's license is posted in a conspicuous place in the box office where it may be observed by the general public.

"2. If the operator has an apprentice or assistant, he may be required to exhibit his official permit granted by the board of examiners of moving picture operators. This permit bears his identification at the bottom, and the number thereon should correspond with the number on the operator's license in the box office.

"3. Warn the operator and owner, or manager, in case of violation, that under no circumstances shall the apprentice be allowed to operate either the moving picture machine, stereopticon, or electric spotlight during an exhibition open to the public. Each apprentice is required to sign such an agreement, which is kept on file by the above mentioned board, before he is granted a permit.

"4. Inquire of the operator whether or not the apparatus is all in first-class operating condition and complies with the letter and spirit of the law.

"5. In case of refusal to comply with the law, Section 1618 of Article 1, Chapter XLVI, of the Chicago Code of 1911, should be enforced."

"Across the Isthmus in 1912" Given High Honor.

H. G. Lux, manager of the Alhambra Amusement Co., of Utica, N. Y., has written as follows to the Selig Polyscope Co., this city: "Feeling that you may be interested, we are enclosing copy of letter received from the Department of State Engineer and Surveyor, requesting a repetition of the Selig release, "Across the Isthmus in 1912." Needless to say, we complied with their request, booking this film for a return date, and it was very well received.

"We wish to congratulate you on this class of production and trust that we will have more of it."

A photo copy of the letter received by Manager Lux bears the signatures of twenty-seven prominent engineers and surveyors. Mr. Lux used this letter, with signatures, in a publication called "The Athletic News and Theatrical Review," which was distributed broadcast in the city. He is to be complimented for keen advertising enterprise.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The name of Charles A. Anderson was unwittingly omitted from the finance committee of the National Convention in my letter last week.

The various committees in charge of the National Convention, to be held in Chicago from August 13 to 17, inclusive, are hard at work. Stickers printed in black and red have been forwarded to all the exchanges and manufacturers in the city, to be used with correspondence and packages sent out to exhibitors. These stickers will be forwarded to manufacturers and exchanges throughout the country, with the request that they be used on all packages sent out. The secretaries of local and state organizations are invited to correspond with William J. Sweeney, chairman of the National Convention committee, 110 S. State Street, for any information regarding the convention. Mr. Sweeney also requests exhibitors throughout this country and Canada who are not yet affiliated with the National League to write him for any information desired. All communications will be promptly answered.

V. R. Day, manager of the Essanay's city office, left for Louisville with a camera force, Thursday, May 9, to take the Derby races which were held there on Saturday, May 11. This race will be used in the coming production by Essanay, the name of which will be announced later.

Bernhardt in "Camille" is still doing fine business at the La Salle. 10, 15, 25 and 50 cents are the ruling prices at this house until 6 p. m., after which hour the admission is 25 and 50 cents. The management of the house is making a mistake in giving the front of this legitimate theater a tawdry appearance by means of cheap cloth banners, etc. Finely executed art posters—3-sheet and 1-sheet in size—should be employed, so as to give a high-class effect at the entrance, in keeping with the high-class character of the presentation in the theater. Class means everything in a case of this kind. First-class people are not enticed by the surroundings of a dugout.

C. Lang Cobb, Jr., traveling representative of Reliance, was a visitor at the World office last week. He is traveling through the Middle West in the interest of his company.

R. M. Powers and Thomas F. Mitchell, owners of the Oakland Theater, 39th Street and Cottage Grove, were seen last week. The Oakland was formerly the Swanson Theater, a very fine and attractive house. The proprietors reported that business has been very good for the past two months. Independent service, furnished by the Laemmle exchange, is used at this house and ten cents admission is charged. A large pipe organ and piano are used to accompany the pictures. About June 15 the house will be closed for a week for redecoration. The Oakland will be kept open all summer, as the ventilation is excellent.

"KERRY GOW" AND "SHAUN RHUE" IN PICTURES.

Kalem Secures Two Celebrated Plays for Production in Ireland—the Author Co-operates.

Apparently Kalem has resolved to maintain their high standard in the production of picturesque dramas in Ireland. Two years ago this enterprising firm sent a producing company to Old Erin and their artistic plays delighted motion picture patrons throughout the world. Last season these artists again visited Killarney and the reception accorded the splendid series of plays—including Boucicault's "The Colleen Bawn" and "Arrah-na-Pogue"—has induced Kalem to send the same company to Ireland this summer.

While Kalem has not disclosed the full details of their coming season's work abroad, it was announced a few weeks ago that Boucicault's "The Shaughraun" had been secured for multiple reel production. It is now learned that Kalem has closed negotiations with Mr. Joseph Murphy covering the exclusive motion picture rights to his celebrated plays "The Kerry Gow" and "Shaun Rhue." These plays, of which Mr. Murphy was co-author, were played by him for over thirty years. Mr. Murphy has co-operated with Kalem, furnishing many details of "business" which made his plays so successful, and the fact that each scene is to be made in the authentic locations should make these dramas fitting successors to the splendid Irish subjects which Kalem has offered in the past.

FILM BASEBALL TEAMS.

Western film manufacturers are evincing a lively interest in the baseball teams recently recruited from the ranks of the American Film Mfg. Company and the Essanay forces. These two teams fought a hard battle, ending in an 8 to 8 tie two weeks ago and are hoping for pleasant weather on Saturday to settle the argument. It is said that the Selig forces contemplate raising a team to try conclusions with the successful contestant.

Kinemacolor Company Branches Out

The American Company Will Make Dramatic and Comedy Subjects in Color—Production Department Under the Direction of T. L. Cochrane.

BRIEF announcement was made in the Moving Picture World last week to the effect that the Kinemacolor Company of America has secured the services of Mr. Thomas L. Cochrane, well known in moving picture circles, to superintend the organization of a plant and stock company for the production of dramatic and comedy subjects by the Kinemacolor process. Mr. Cochrane is now busily engaged in the preliminary work of selecting the proper location for the producing plant and a competent stock company of players. Owing to the nature of the Kinemacolor process all the pictures must be taken by sunlight, which necessitates the location of the studio at some point where the best scenic effects may be found close at hand.

While this work is going on the activities of the Kinemacolor Company are progressing along other and very interesting lines. A representative of the Moving Picture World learned from Mr. Henry J. Brock, president of the company, that a party of operators were to start this week on a picture making trip to the principal national parks of the United States. This work is being done by special arrangement and with the co-operation of the Department of the Interior at Washington. The points to be visited will include the Grand Canon of the Colorado River, Yellowstone Park, Glacier National Park and Ranier National Park, and finally the Great Crater Lake National Park and the world famous Yosemite Valley.

By special arrangement with the Navy Department, the Kinemacolor Company will take views of the principal battleships of the United States Navy.

The expedition to the National Parks will be in charge of Mr. Alfred G. Gosden, who will have the assistance of two camera men and will also be accompanied by Mr. Lawrence Grant, well-known lecturer, who goes to familiarize himself with the points to be pictured. The expedition will be fully equipped with guides and cooks, pack horses and mules to carry the camp outfit. It is expected that the expedition will obtain pictures from points that have never before been reached by the moving picture camera. The Department of the Interior has given every assistance in its power to make this expedition a success. It is announced by the Kinemacolor Company that the title for this series will be "See America First," and it hopes to give the public a new view of the natural beauties of our own country.

While all these activities in the field are progressing, Mr. Brock is preparing to install his company in more suitable quarters in the Mecca Building, Forty-eighth Street and Broadway, New York. The entire sixth floor of that building has been leased for office purposes, giving a floor space of 12,5000 square feet. The present offices at 145 West 45th Street will be used for manufacturing purposes.

"It is our intention," said Mr. Brock, "to establish our own exchanges throughout this country and Canada, which territory this company controls. We expect to have an ample program for all requirements. Many improvements have been made within the past year or two in the Kinemacolor process, and companies have been formed in France, Italy, Belgium and Germany to make pictures by that process. With the product of these companies and that of our own, there will be no dearth of good subjects, and we hope to open the coming season with a long list of interesting and attractive pictures."

"It is also the intention of the Kinemacolor Company," said Mr. Brock, "to control the theaters showing Kinemacolor pictures. The first step in this direction is the appointment of Mr. Arthur A. Lotto to the position of General Representative of the company in the Canadian Northwest. Mr. Lotto will travel to the coast, making arrangements in the various cities for the building and leasing of theaters and the granting of franchises for the exhibition of Kinemacolor pictures. A similar course will be pursued in the United States."

WILLIAM G. GEORGIOU ENLARGES CIRCUIT.

William G. Georgiou, Mansfield, Ohio, who originally started in the picture business as the proprietor of the Arris Theater, at Mansfield, has made several additions to his theater holdings. He recently purchased the Alvin Theater, of Mansfield, the Grand at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, and the Arris at Shelby, Ohio. These houses will be operated in conjunction and special attractions will be booked for the circuit. The seating capacity of the various houses is as follows: Arris, Mansfield, 300; Alvin, 400; Grand, 400; Arris, Shelby, 200. The equipment in all the houses is modern and attractive.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN.

Detail Music for Pictures.

"Mr. Clarence E. Sinn, Moving Picture World; Dear Sir:—I must say I am somewhat in the position of Mr. Vail, who felt it necessary to explain in your last issue. I feel an explanation is necessary regarding the programs for the music to the pictures at the "Marvel." I am sure everyone will agree that detail work is necessary in picture playing; I admit it cannot be intelligently done without some detail work, but we are apt to grow monotonous to our hearers by too much of this and in spite of ourselves get into a rut. No one doubts the necessity of good, snappy ragtime for the comedies. Here, too, discretion must be used, for often a popular song even for comedy could suggest a very ridiculous idea. For a comic duel we could not think of playing "Put On Your Old Gray Bonnet." The study of suitable music for drama's taken as a whole is fascinating to say the least.

"Much detail work must be given to the "101 Bison" subjects and the climax of these beautiful plays is well worth studying. I will only mention two: "The Battle of the Red Men," and "The Deserters." I closed "The Battle of the Red Men" with "Torch Dance" from Henry the Eighth Dances, until Indian maid hurls the chief over the precipice, then the presto finale. During the contemplation of the quiver of arrows until the end, "Less Than the Dust" (Indian Love Lyric suite by Finden).

"For 'The Deserter': songs from 'Chocolate Soldier,' 'Forgive, Forgive,' 'Sympathy,' etc.; "My Hero" during viewing body of the Deserter; Chopin's Funeral March for the procession to the grave; after the firing of the volleys, "taps," of course; 'America' as the band and soldiers leave the grave, allowing music to diminish as they disappear in the distance.

"Taken as a whole, 'The Meister Singers' selection worked out fine for the 'Violin Maker of Nuremburg' (Solax), using the 'Prize Songs' for violin contest. One thing more—the rythmical work on 'Classical Dances of Countess de Swirsky' (Imp): No. 1, 'Anitra's Dance' (Greig); No. 2, 'Graceful Dancer' (Tracy), and No. 3, 'Spanish Dances' from La Traviata. Much credit is due our trap player, who assisted so ably in putting these dances over, especially the Gypsy dance. I am, yours sincerely,

M. W. DITTMAR, Frederick, Md."

Just the mere reading of the above is a treat to a picture-music fan. This correspondent evidently believes that the very best you have is none too good for the pictures—that is, for good pictures. The list of music is among the very best, and, moreover, fits the situations cited. The Henry the Eighth Dances contain other good numbers, which I am mentioning for the benefit of those who are not familiar with them. The "Shepherd's Dance" is a good characteristic. "Anitra's Dance" (Peer Gynt suite by Grieg) is also useful in many dramatic pictures. I used it to effect in "The Golden Supper" (Biograph) a year ago. The "Scarf Dance" is another number to have. In fact, the world is full of good music, but it is often hard to think of when you want it most. Such letters as quoted above ought to be of great value in a suggestive way as well for the hints offered toward the proper musical accompaniment of the pictures mentioned. I hope we have not heard the last of you, M. W. Dittmar. Come again.

A correspondent is asking for information regarding music for "Western" pictures. I presume she wants titles of the so-called "Western intermezzos." Here are two or three picked out at random: "Starlight Sioux" (Aubrey Stauffer), "Indian Summer" (Niel Moret), "Kick-a-poo" (Von Tilzer), "My Prairie Queen" (Von Tilzer), "Blue Feather," "Orinoco," "Lily of the Prairie," "Starland," etc. Don't overlook "Zephyr" from the suite of the four winds by Trinkhaus (published by Witmark). Some day I think I will make a long list of this kind of stuff and fill this page with it; there seems to be an unquenchable demand for it. Speaking of the four winds suite, this is a valuable addition to anybody's catalog. The "South Wind" number ("Sirocco") is Oriental in character, and the "East Wind" is a fine Chinese characteristic. All are good.

The Kalem Co. promises us an Egyptian picture with music May 27th. As they have not disappointed us in the past we may safely expect a welcome addition to our list of Oriental music, for it is a safe bet that a great deal, if not all, of it can be used later for other pictures of like nature. I know of some who are still using numbers from "Colleen Bawn," "Arrah-na-pogue," "Spartan Mother," "Il Trovatore," and "Faust" whenever the opportunity offers. And why not? It pays to get this special music when issued by these enterprising producers, and it likewise pays to keep it. So you see you profit doubly. Talking about Oriental music—for we were talking about it a few lines ago—here is a list which is worth your while: "Star of India" (Bratton), "In the Soudan" (pub. by Witmark), "In a Pagoda" (Bratton), "Oriental Dance" (Victor Herbert), "Egyptian Love Dance" (Pryor), "Hiko-Hiko" (Luders), "Hindoo Priests' Incantation" (Bendix), and "Mystic Shrine." Puccinni's "Madame Butterfly" offers some especial stuff which, though not easy, will repay anyone who will take the trouble to study it.

SOME SUGGESTIONS.

Mr. King, director of the Orpheum Theater orchestra, has kindly furnished the following suggestions:

"Queen Elizabeth's Ring" (Cines).

1. Waltz lento through first scene (short).
2. Paderewski's Minuet (or Gavotte—long) till scene with Page and Maid; then:
3. Allegretto till Lord Leigh enters.
4. Short agitato till "The Page Reveals, etc."
5. Andantino from Raymond overture till "The Plot—The Arrest."
6. Agitato till "In the London Tower."
7. Mysterious until change of scene.
8. Neutral till "To the Block."
9. Long pathetic (Massinet's "Elegy," "Aria from Pagliacci," or any standard number of serious nature) till close.

"The Craven" (Vitagraph).

1. and 2. Light intermezzos of the popular "Western" character (like "Sunbird," "Starlight," etc.). Fill in with these till: "Give Me Fifty Dollars or I'll Kill You."
3. Short agitato mezzo-forte till change of scene.
4. Same music as 1 and 2 till letter is shown on screen.
5. Semi-mysterious (agitated nature) till "Black Pete."
6. Agitato for rifle duel ("shot" sound effects); play till she starts to enter the rushes.
7. Second movement in Suppe's "Morning, Noon and Night" overture (the andantino) till end.

"Paying the Price" (Lubin).

1. Intermezzo ("Western type") till Bert Adams seizes woman's arm.
2. Agitato till he rides away.
3. Similar to No. 1 (mysterious nature) till "Tell Ned Davis, etc."
5. Agitato till "The Theft of His Horse, etc."
7. Similar to No. 1 till Ned enters his home.
8. When Ned starts to leave, agitato till "Let Me Take Him."
9. Hurry for struggle and fire till ""You've Lost Your Cabin, etc."
10. Lively till close.

"For the Papoose" (Pathe).

1. Os-ka-loo-sa-loo" (Indian song) till change of scene.
2. When he seizes girl, short agitato till "That Same Night."
3. Long, semi-mysterious agitato till Indian kills sleeping man.
4. Hurry till "Next Morning."
5. Indian music, sentimental order, till man throws cloth over Indian girl's head.
6. Agitato till "Be Not Afraid, My Sister."
7. Long, semi-mysterious till struggle.
8. Hurry till man is seen dead.
9. Sentimental Indian character (long) till end.

Suggestions for Pianists.

By C. K. Aiken.

PADEREWSKI'S "Minuet" has always been popular with pianists and deservedly so, for it has liveliness and grace to a marked degree. Few seem to know, however, that there is a minuet in A by Paderewski which is very nearly as pretty as the one in G. The opportunities for using these minuets in pictures are simply legion. I do not believe in confining their use to just ballroom scenes, but would employ them in parlor dramas or stories of high society. Paderewski plays the G minuet for the Victrola and it would be a good thing for every pianist to first hear him play it before personally attempting it. He takes the first movement in a light, crisp way, almost staccato; in the next he brings the bass up to quite a climax. His "Melodie" from the "Chants du Voyageur," a beautiful nocturne of the sea with soft and exquisite harmonies, is just as useful in its way as the minuets.

In these days when we are having so many Mexican pictures it is a pleasure to run across a new piece like Valverde's "Tango Argentino" or Spanish dance. Music of this character never exists in abundance.

Of course, for all practical purposes, Spanish and Mexican music is the same. Such a song as La Paloma is often designated as Spanish and then again as Mexican. That old favorite, the "Bedouin Love Song," will get across as Spanish, although, to be exact, it is Arabian. Where there is such a poverty of national music, it doesn't matter if the distinctions are not always accurate.

"Moonlight," by Finch, is a late piece of considerable merit. His "In the Shadows" has been very popular, but "Moonlight" should be even more so. Some music stores do not carry these European successes so much as they do the ten-cent American "rags." I wouldn't want to maintain that the price of music is a true indication of its value. Nevertheless, in music as in other things, you must pay for what you get. The really good music, outside of pieces on which the copyright has expired, costs from twenty-five cents to a dollar a copy. Ninety cents for Strauss' "Rosenkavalier Waltz" is money well invested. A dollar for seven of Carrie Jacob Bond's songs in a tiny volume will seem small compared with the satisfaction and pleasure to be derived from them.

To interest intelligent people, pianists must play music of character and intelligence. The entire program must be on a higher plane than it has been in the past. A great deal of attention is now being given to playing the pictures with the idea of fixing attention on the picture through music which either by familiarity of name or sound suggests the picture. This is a very laudable endeavor, but it is a mistake to think that any music, however appropriate, can be attractive when rendered in a cheap, amateurish fashion. There must be refinement and cultivation in the execution, else intelligent people will not care to listen.

POLICE EXCEEDING AUTHORITY.

A singular example of the misuse of police authority is submitted to us by Mr. A. J. Clapham, a manufacturer of motion picture slides. Recently Mr. Clapham offered to moving picture theaters a series of slides appertaining to the "Titanic" disaster. There was nothing sensational or gruesome in these pictures, they being views of the ill-fated ship prior to the disaster, pictures of the officers of the ship and of notables among its passengers, and pictures of the "Carpathia" and its officers.

Notwithstanding, the superintendent of police of Pittsburgh under date of May 1st, 1912, issued the following notice to picture theaters in that city:

> "Owners of Nickelodeons: You are hereby notified that the exhibition of moving pictures or slides descriptive of, or in any way pertaining to, the 'Titanic' steamship disaster are hereafter prohibited.
> (Signed) Thomas A. McQuaide,
> "Superintendent of Police."

It may be possible that the ordinances of the city of Pittsburgh clothe its police department with arbitrary power to suppress public exihibtions of any character, and it may be that Superintendent MacQuaide is within his power when he presumes to prohibit the pictures in question. It is strange that the Pittsburgh police should suppress the exhibition of "Titanic" pictures in Nickelodeons, while the identical pictures are being presented to the public in the daily newspapers, and we have not heard that Superintendent MacQuaide has ordered the Pittsburgh newspapers to cease printing pictures of the "Titanic" disaster. If there is a more ridiculous use of police authority than this instance, the Moving Picture World would be pleased to hear of it.

Arrangements for Toledo Convention.

Toledo Commerce Club Assures Ohio Exhibitors that Nothing will Be Omitted to Make Their July Meeting a Success.

Observing that there was some complaint as to the manner in which the Dayton convention was managed, the Convention Bureau of the Toledo Commerce Club has issued an interesting letter to those who expect to attend the convention of the Ohio State Exhibitors' Association, which is dated to be held July 16 and 17. The Moving Picture World considers this communication of sufficient interest to the trade generally to entitle it to space in these columns:

May 15th, 1912.

Editor Motion Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir: I notice in the last number of the Motion Picture World a criticism of the last Convention of Motion Picture Exhibitors at Dayton, to the effect that manufacturers were becoming discouraged to bring exhibits to the convention because so much time was taken up with other matters that the delegates had no time to view the exhibits. Criticism was also made that the program was not carried out on time.

As president of the Convention Bureau of the City of Toledo and in behalf of the local exhibitors, I wish to state that the the coming convention in Toledo in July strict business methods will be used in the handling of conventions.

The Convention Bureau of our city makes it a business to go after conventions and then handling the delegates in a way that sends them away from the city as boosters. Conventions handled in any other way are a knock to a city.

We have salaried officers who give their entire time to the handling of conventions, entertaining delegates and seeing that the business of the convention is handled with dispatch.

I was in Dayton and one of the chief difficulties was the fact that the Convention Hall was a long way from the center of the city.

Our hall is in the very heart of the city, not over four blocks from any hotel. In this building are many exhibition rooms where manufacturers can place their goods where all the delegates will spend the balance of their time.

Our bureau has co-operated with the local exhibitors to the end that this convention be handled on a business basis. When an event is scheduled for a certain time, IT WILL BE CARRIED OUT ON THAT TIME. While there will be entertainment, it will not be to the detriment of the business of the convention.

Toledo is essentially a summer city and all who come to the next convention, July 16-17th, will have an opportunity to enjoy a beautiful lake ride to Put-In-Bay, rich in historic interest and resplendent in a scenic setting of rare beauty. Delegates can go to beautiful Toledo Beach for the finest bathing on the great lakes. They can enjoy the trip around the Maumee River Belt line and those who have viewed the majestic spendor of the Hudson say the Maumee River views are fully as beautiful.

The local exhibitors are all live ones, with the interest of the great moving picture business at heart. They intend to see that you have a good time, our Convention Bureau intends to co-operate with them, but better than all that, we propose to see that the business of the convention is put first and that manufacturers who go to the expense of sending exhibits here will have ample opportunity to show them to all delegates and visitors.

While we shall do everything possible to give the delegates a mighty fine time, we propose first and foremost to have the convention do lasting good for the great motion picture industry and for the exhibitors.

If anyone wishes any other information I can be addressed, care Toledo Railways and Light Company, Toledo, Ohio.

Trusting to show you real Toledo hospitality on July 16th and 17th, I am, Very truly yours,

E. R. Kelsey,
Pres. Toledo Convention Bureau.

The HARRY FURNISS PHOTOPLAYS

PRODUCED BY EDISON

Written by LOUIS REEVES HARRISON.

THE humorous inventions of Harry Furniss have been seemingly unpretentious, being largely confined to caricatures pictorial of well-known persons or events or other symbolical compositions, designed to advocate or attack some political idea or social condition, with no other claim than that of exciting laughter or gayety, but he is really a fine artist as well as a master of good humor. Without being unduly lavish in according him admiration, I can honestly say that I was surprised and delighted on witnessing a private exhibition of the Edison productions of his designing, not only with the plays themselves, but with the artist's style of acting, particularly when he injected a suave urbanity that was almost academic into the merry little comedies.

These photoskits were possibly intended to be farces, but they deserve a better name, for there is no extravagant buffoonery and nothing that could be called unduly exuberant, though all are filled with situations that excite joyous laughter. The fundamental idea in each of those I saw is humorous, and the scenes in which he appears are comic from the direct simplicity and unconscious dignity of his acting. He does not act in the feigning sense of that word at all, but moves along quite as easily and naturally as in daily life, itself a refreshing variation from the artificiality of the average stage performer, but there is art beneath it all—it is no easy matter to get an honest laugh out of those long weary of strained efforts to bring out the smiles of a mixed audience.

Harry Furniss, Esq.

The reason that these fun makers rise above farce into the domain of true comedy is due to the injection of some philosophic idea—it is the idea in a play that makes it worth while when it rises above the lowest form—but the artist's personality, particularly his breadth of beam, helps along. He is so jolly-looking that we take an interest in him as an individual from the outset. There is a sort of bless-you-my-children atmosphere about him all the time which wins, though its repetition might not go so well if assumed by a man merely playing a part. He succeeds in assimilating justness and generosity with delicate good humor.

In "The Artist's Joke" Mr. Furniss does not attempt anything more serious than fooling a lot of young ladies who have planted their easels before a picturesque ruin, with the intention of making sketches of it. In order to distinguish which is which among a dozen blank stretches of Bristol-board on their return from lunch, the young ladies place their names at the top of each sheet of drawing paper and leave these all ready for use on their supports. Along comes the jolly artist, an amusing idea is suggested by the names, and he proceeds to use some crayons left behind in adding offhand, descriptive personalities to each of the names exposed. Utter demoralization ensues when the young ladies return and results in one of their number being opportunely left behind.

Now, it happened that the joking artist's nephew had reached that inevitable though mysterious moment when it seemed to him that life was not worth the living in the solitude of a country retreat without the companion that all men seek sooner or later to better their lot; and he was ripe for what followed as well as indirectly responsible for the wandering of the flock's most precious lambkin. He had at last met HER and his opportunity to declare himself is wholly due to the "Artist's Joke." This playlet barely rises to the level of the others, and it is saved by the well-chosen scenic effects quite as well as by the acting of Mr. Furniss in the center role. The interior is admirable, while the exterior of importance, that of the ruin, shows that pains and taste were active in making so charming a selection.

There is some bright humor of the wholesome sort in the courtship of the young people and in the scene where they discover the cause of it all, but we find that we are most amused by the facial and gestural expression of the artist, which is beyond my limited vocabulary to accurately describe. I will wager that the director of the play had a time holding him down. In breaking in on the rules and regulations of what is supposed to be good acting, Furniss keeps us laughing in spite of ourselves. No one else holds attention while he is on the stage, and I am not sure that it might have been desirable to have allowed him to go as far as he liked.

When, several weeks ago, I asked Mr. Plimpton what he intended to do with Mr. Furniss, he had not fully determined how the artist's genius could be incorporated in the Edison productions, but it now seems that he has chosen the most effective method possible, as the pictures show for themselves. The noted caricaturist's personality is a card in itself. The only thing lacking in these comedies is some one of distinctive personality to play opposite the man in the leading roles. The highest point in comedy—this seems to involve an inviolable principle of dramatic construction—is the clash of two characters at the crisis of the piece.

Such a type is indicated in "The Shadow on the Blind," the second of the stories and one which might be called a comedy of ingenuity. There Furniss has opposed to him the autocratic character of a stern father whose son is to marry, sight unseen, the daughter of an old and wealthy friend, who has left his child a fortune. The autocratic father is so determined to force his son into an alliance with a lady, neither of them know by sight, that he flies into a boiling rage over the discovery of a shadow on the blind of a house directly opposite his library. The shadow is that of his son courting the daughter of a jolly artist who lives in an adjoining house, and it plainly indicates that his son's heart is reaching out for a natural mate.

Here is an inevitable clash, and it occurs between the two parents of the young people, but opportunity is lacking to show the two fathers in an intimate relation which would intensify the interest. When the son returns home after an evening of love-making, he finds that his father has been watching the whole affair as thrown in shadow picture on the window shade of the artist's house. The old man denounces as outrageous the conduct that bids fair to upset his plans and lays down the law that the son must reserve his attentions for the expected heiress—he has received a letter announcing her expected arrival on a visit.

I would have liked to have seen Furniss present at this interview. A meeting between the two opposed characters is almost expected by the audience—previous action leads up to it—and its absence arouses a feeling of dissatisfaction. However, all plays do not apply the decisive principle, and the artist papa assists the young couple in a manner which brings out his resources. He induces his daughter to pose at the window-shade until he can make a silhouette of her face and figure as she often sits, engaged in reading a book, attaches this to the shade and proceeds to outline a bold plan for outwitting papa autocratic by stratagem.

The artist's daughter is induced to assume an unbecoming disguise and prepare to visit her prospective, though unwilling father-in-law, while masked as the expected heiress. She is made up as an unlovely suffragette, and a portrait in which her assumed peculiarities are exaggerated is forwarded to the autocratic papa, while her father, the caricaturist, goes to the station to meet the real heiress and divert her attention for the time being. Papa autocratic receives the supposed heiress cordially in spite of her appearance and insists upon an immediate marriage ceremony because his son has fallen into the toils of a siren whose silhouette he points out on the window shade across the way.

The son yields to the apparent force of circumstances, a clergyman is hastily called and a wedding takes place in due form, while the artist is engaged in driving the real heiress round and round like a drunken sailor in a taxi, taken by the hour. No matter if the situation is a little strained, Cupid, in the person of Harry Furniss —he must have looked like one when he was a baby—wins out, the lovers are married, and the real heiress, arriving in belligerent mood, makes such a poor impression that autocratic papa is relieved to find that he has a really charming daughter-in-law, even if he has been deceived.

"Who is responsible for all this deception?" he demands of his son, while pointing out that the objectionable young lady across the way is still seated at the window reading. All look out at the portrait in black on the opposite window shade. As if in response to the question, the shade is raised, girl and all, and Harry Furniss appears in the open window, a benignant smile on his face, waving his congratulations. He has not only played the part of match-maker in masterly fashion, but he looks the part.

Superior to either of those photo-comedies is "Master and Pupil," a drama of some emotional appeal with magnificent opportunities for the talented artist. Harry Furniss is at his best in the serious and self-denying role of a master artist in this photoplay and his character drawings for some of the creations of Charles Dickens are a revelation. The rapidity and accuracy with which his hand directs the course of every line in the sketches excite the wonder of all who watch their preparation.

The softening good humor of the other playlets here gives way to the telling of a story with a purpose. The favorite pupil of an elderly artist (Furniss), has done so well with a firm of publishers that he becomes sensitive to criticism and breaks away from his teacher and the latter's daughter, to whom he is engaged. This serious step is taken in a moment of irritability and leads to a nervous collapse on the part of the favorite pupil not healed by the fact that other critics confirm the master's view, but a splendid chance to try out his quality comes into the form of an unsolicited order from the publishers for some original illustrations to a new edition of Dickens' novels.

The young artist, working in a garret, determined to make good, finds himself overcome by his heart-breaking experiences, collapses under severe strain and sinks down at night in a fit of complete exhaustion. Meanwhile, the daughter of the master artist feels the situation keenly, her instinctive knowledge of what is likely to happen is quickened by natural sympathies, and she grieves so constantly that her father takes it upon himself to call upon his former pupil on his way to a dinner given for his especial benefit. When he reaches the garret he finds his former pupil lying on the floor in a sleep of supreme exhaustion, incapable of further effort with his important assignment spread out on his work table and the publisher's letter relating to it lying there opened.

What shall he do? He is in evening dress, a dinner given in his honor is waiting, an engagement of that kind is not to be slighted, he is under no obligations to the pupil who left him in a fit of temper, but the young man will encounter demoralizing disaster if the illustrations are not made ready by morning. Now enters one of the most beautiful elements in human existence, the sympathetic emotion which leads one man to help another in the time of trouble at a cost of dangerous self-denial. It is the spirit of brotherhood which enabled primitive man to rise superior to all other creatures on earth, which enabled the early settlers of this country to stand shoulder to shoulder against all foes of religious and political liberty.

Furniss tears up the invitation card bearing his name, removes his coat and enters upon the tremendous undertaking of finishing all the illustrations so that they will be ready by the time the publisher's messenger arrives the following morning. Hour after hour he works, while his former pupil sleeps. We are given glimpses of a genuine artist in action, are permitted to see in small scope the ease and skill with which his deft fingers trace the well-known characteristics of Quilp, Micawber, Pickwick and others, and we watch him labor through the long night with that splendid song of universal sympathy throbbing in our hearts, which Dickens knew so well and so often set resounding down the corridors of world-wide appreciation.

It is this big human note that elevates "Master and Pupil" above the other Furniss plays. The artist plays his part with dignity, and, returning home in the 'wee small hours, finds his daughter sitting up in a state of anxiety. He reassures her that all is well with her lover, sends her to bed and sinks down in an easy chair to rest. He lights a cigar, but his hand wavers, and he gradually drops asleep. When morning comes, he wakes as from a dream, and proceedes to trace lines in the air with his unconsumed cigar. He is so occupied when rejoined by his daughter, and presently his pupil returns in penitent mood.

When the pupil awakes in his garret, it is to find a messenger from the publishers engaged in inspecting a masterly set of drawings completing the work undertaken in vain the previous evening, and he is dazed to find that he has suddenly become a successful artist. He remains in a state of confusion after the messenger's departure, until he finds the scraps of the invitation card, when the noble magninimity of his master overwhelms him with sorrow for the offence he has committed. Troubled by a sense of his own wrong impression of the one who criticised his work in purest friendship and resolved on amending matters, he returns to his former relation with greater happiness for all concerned.

Director Miller deserves a great deal of credit for the intelligent care shown in producing these photoplays. He has the dramatic faculty and the innate power of setting on the studio stage the play to be performed so that the spectator may fully enjoy through the eyes what is lacking in aural appeal. In judging and defining the qualities and merits of a photodrama I may have seemed unduly harsh in generalities about directors, but this is always done with full recognition of the fact that no class of men in the moving picture business carry heavier burdens of responsibility. I naturally take the playwright's side of the question, but I can honestly say that I think the dramatist is only one torch lighting another.

Because of the enormous influx of amateurish matter sent in to producers the real playwrights have received scant consideration, and this will eventually prove injurious to the new art in driving from the field those who will be needed to tell new stories on the screen, but who have gone to a better-paying market. Instead of an antagonism between two essential elements to success, I should like to see fostered a harmony educational to both and beneficial to all concerned. The real dramatic author, whether he is writing for the stage or the screen, has to fill the eyes of the audiences, and must write from a larger descriptive point of view if he knows his business. He must consider stage settings, scenery, decorative principles, costumes and the movements of actors quite as well as the stage manager, and when all work together for the desired end we shall see a great step forward in the evolution of the art that will startle the world with big feature photodramas of profound, original and modern ideas dressed in forms of beauty and widely ennobling in their influence.

CINES AND ECLIPSE FILMS.

George Kleine has scheduled for release for the week ending Saturday, May 25th, three splendid dramas which are worthy of special attention on the part of exhibitors. Everyone is familiar now and knows what to expect when it is announced that the Cines Company have laid the scenes for "Fatima," the release of May 21st, among the picturesque palaces and environs of Morocco with its quaint Moorish costumes and tropical grandeur. The story concerns the beautiful Fatima, who is betrothed to Melik, a powerful Omar, to the distant home of Fatima, with orders to bring her back to him. It is quite natural that the two young people thrown closely together during their tedious return journey and after Omar has rescued the fair Fatima from a band of roving desert robbers who attack them, should fall madly in love with each other. How they escape from their dilemma and the wrath of the angry Melik is best left for the film to tell. The settings are gorgeous; scenes well carried out; action lively throughout and the story consistent and excellently interpreted. To complete the reel, a short scenic has been added showing many interesting sights in and around the city of Padua, Italy, among which may be mentioned a beautiful view of the ruins of the Roman Ampitheatre.

The Eclipse release for Wednesday, the 22nd, is a very powerful drama showing how a girl who has been jilted by the man she loves is in after years placed in a position where she has an opportunity of revenging herself upon her onetime lover. The temptation is very strong and she is torn with conflicting emotions, but the fact which gives the play its title "Her Better Nature" prevails, and she refuses to take advantage of her sacred trust merely to punish him. A highly interesting short athletic subject called "The Jumping Champion, MacMoreland," ends this reel and is bound to cause audiences to marvel that a human being can possibly leap unaided over such tremendous obstructions as are placed in his way; automobiles, squads of soldiers and many other unusual objects.

For the Saturday release, Kleine has prepared an excellent Cines detective story called "A Mysterious Telephone Call," which should prove attractive as a thriller for grown-ups as well as the younger set. The plot centers around Detective Roberts, who in endeavoring to capture single-handed a band of daring bank robbers, gets himself into a number of very tight places and our interest is excited to watch how he succeeds in extricating himself and finally landing behind the bars the desperate criminals. Scenes are shown of the robbers' den, the secret stairway, the trapdoor, the interior of the bank vault and views of the bank which they intended to rob. It is a good story shown in a very interesting manner.

SUBSTITUTION OF PICTURES.

As was announced in last week's issue the Nestor Company intended releasing on Saturday, May 25th, the film entitled "The Sheriff Outwitted." This subject has been replaced by the split reel entitled "Santa Monica Road Race" and "Oil Field, California." The Eclair Company is also making a change in their release for Sunday, May 26th, form "Revenge is Blind" to the split reel entitled, "Married Without Knowing It" and "Types of the Caucasus."

OWENSBORO, KY., TO HAVE $20,000 PICTURE HOUSE.

Word has reached us that Mr. G. A. Bleich has closed a deal to erect on Fredericka Street, Owensboro, Ky., a $20,000 moving picture theater. The plans call for the erection of it just opposite the postoffice and custom house, and the size of the lot is 45 feet by 135 feet. It is stated that this house will be the most elaborate, most perfectly ventilated picture theater in Owensboro. The requisite number of exits have been provided and the theater will have 800 seating capacity. Mr. Bleich expects to have the house open to the public at or about midsummer.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

An Educational.

UP in Toronto George D. Perry and Company started the U Kum Theater in a residential against the advice of experienced picture men and tacts who might be supposed to know.

There was plenty of lively opposition to the opening of the picture house in a fashionable locality, but it didn't seem to bother the company much and they went straight ahead, giving good licensed pictures and with such success that they have cut out even the illustrated song and make their offering straight pictures.

The secret of their success is very simple. Finding that pictures were objected to, they went to work to demonstrate that the pictures were not the horrible things they were supposed to be. They got out a four-page weekly program with a couple of advertisements to cover the expense and on the front and back pages they tell about the pictures and what they can do.

The result has been a steady demand for the standing room sign and the cessation of much of the opposition. They did not reply to opposition with abuse, but met the objections clearly and straightforwardly. On the back of the current issue is an excerpt from the London Advertiser. The item is merely taken as a text for argument that is cool, dispassionate and convincing. It is reproduced here as a suggestion to others who may need such material:

> We note by the London "Advertiser" of recent date that several prominent London gentlemen have returned from a three months' trip to South America. Speaking to the "Advertiser," one of them said: "The people of the north know very little about South America, and it is a great object lesson to visit some of the cities in the south * * * We also visited the Panama Canal. The construction of the canal itself is a marvelous bit of work." We wish to correct just one phrase of the above statement. It should read "some of the people" instead of "the people." In this day of enlightenment there is little of interest in "any" part of the world that is not reproduced in motion pictures. The cities of South America, Europe, China and Japan, the beautiful scenes in Switzerland, the Lakes of Killarney, the barbaric tribes of Central Africa, the trades and customs of the natives of India, Egypt, the desert and its "ships," are all familiar to patrons of the photo play theaters. The Panama Canal, reproduced in motion pictures, is a masterpiece. From the Gulf to the Pacific you are given a view of every feature of this gigantic undertaking. The immense locks, the steam shovels, the mammoth concrete mixers, the work trains, and track-laying machines. You are more familiar with this great work after viewing the pictures than you could be were you to spend months in the Canal Zone. As a geographical and historical educator, an evening spent in a photoplay theater viewing such scenes gives the student a more thorough and comprehensive understanding of the subject than years in the public schools and universities could produce. Apart from the rest and health-giving qualities of such a trip, you may have a broader view of these scenes by attending the photoplay theaters, and at considerably less expense. For instance, on Wednesday next we show you the "Bari Tribe" of the Egyptian Soudan. To view these scenes personally would cost you many hundreds of dollars. We conduct this tour without loss of time or comfort to yourself on Wednesday evening for ten cents. You can have the hundreds thus saved to you to spend on your summer vacation.
> We conduct tours of a similar nature almost every evening at small cost to the tourist.

But Back It Up.

But an educational campaign, like any other, has to be backed up. They have a good machine, make their own current and employ a first-class operator to project the proper sort of films. Putting it into a word; they give a good show. No matter how strongly you may advertise your house and your program, unless you have a good show for those whom your advertising attracts, you are wasting your money, for the more you spend the more generally you advertise the fact that you have a poor performance, and when you do make a change and give a good bill those who have heard the cry of Wolf! too often cannot again be attracted. Mr. Perry announces that he has the best operator in the country, which argues that he has a good one. That campaign of education might say something about good operators.

We are inclined to think that Mr. Perry errs on the side of modesty in his front page display. He should have better than 24 point type for his theater's name on a sheet four and a half inches wide. If he wants to keep the page light a 42 or 48 point Cheltenham Inline would be just the thing and in keeping with the rest.

Making the Best of It.

S. A. Arnold, of the Lyric Theater, Mena, Ark., sends in a throwaway which announces the Eclair, The Wrong Bottle, and adds:

> Miss Gibson takes the part of the Bride in this picture, and, by the way, Miss Gibson was on board the ill-fated Titantic and was one of the rescued passengers.

We like that casual "and by the way" and are inclined to think it better advertising than the release in which Miss Gibson is featured in a Titanic story. Mr. Arnold explains that he did not have the Titantic pictures, so he did the next best thing he could. The point is that he did it nicely and did not offend good taste by a flashy display. The seemingly chance allusion is in far better form. He has an Eclair release and quite as an afterthought, adds that Miss Gibson was in the Titanic disaster. We have commented before on some of Mr. Arnold's work and are glad to see that he is keeping up to standard. Even those who might crowd in to see a Titanic reel are apt to experience a revulsion later on when they think it over in cold blood.

Mr. Arnold also sends a special circular featuring his music; "the best two-piece orchestra in the South." What are you doing for your people? He finds it pays him to get out a couple a week for the players.

Let Go Your Samples, Please.

The Columbian Theater, Wamego, Kansas, sends in about eight ounces of advertising with the request that it be returned. Those who send samples to this department will add to their courtesy if they will send only material that can be pasted up as a guide to the printer in suggesting the display. The Columbian went into a town where several ventures had failed and made good through steady and consistent advertising. They offer no startling novelty of idea, but they display their wares attractively. We believe that if they took a little more trouble with catchlines and descriptive sentences they would find that it pays even more.

Talk from Montgomery.

We regard Montgomery, the Moving Picture Man, as the shrewdest advertiser in the motion picture field. He doesn't merely talk about his pictures, but he covers all his ground, and tells about his house, his plans and his people. To employ a baseball phrase, he bats the ball all over the lot. One of his recent leaders had to do with his projection, the talk being followed by full synopses of the day's run. He says:

> "Ce le ton que fait la musique—it's the tone that makes the music." This old French adage can be very aptly paraphrased regarding moving pictures. It's the art of projection that makes the moving picture, and in this respect I have set a new standard for my exhibition, for I have perfected the art of showing moving pictures to the highest degree obtainable.
> I own the most scientific machines and my operators are experts in their line of work and far above mediocrity.
> Look at any picture shown at my theater and you'll admit that they are as clear as a crystal. No flickering—no injury or tiring to the eye. Every detail is brought out in a most artistic manner.
> This is only one of the features in which the Montgomery Theater excels; and now for the program itself.

Why not try something along this line for your house, in the papers, your program or even in front of the theater? It's the sort of straight talk that counts.

That One-Reel Feature.

Here is a letter from Carey Wilson, who is the joyously joyful publicity man for the Criterion Theater in Rutherford, N. J. He writes:

> THE MORNING AFTER.
> You will note by the above dating that something happened last night. It did and happened with a bang. Last night was "Lillian Walker Night" in our series of "Popular Player Nights." I'm trying not to be mercenary and think of the box-office receipts, which were something staggering, our only trouble being to get the first crowd out of the theater to let the howling mob outside get in. Everybody wanted to stay all evening just to see Lily again and still again. Having got this spasm off my mind, I want to say a few words about the chat we had in the current "World." Your criticism is exceptionally just and apt. I did go to it with more enthusiasm than judgment, but that's my way of doing things. Still I feel you forgot one thing. Your sample adv. for "How Motion Pictures Are Made," was a corker and I wish I had had it in time to use, but you overlook one thing, and that is, that I got the people into the theater and they knew that they were only going to see one reel. It's the comments on the "Morning After" that I want to get rid of. Now, for instance, I got hold of "————" and banged it out strong to the school authorities, the kids themselves and the public at large. Well, I had a body of school-teachers down here just to see what the educational value of the "Movies" was, and after the show they lit into me (as well as the general public and my friends) with the argument that the film was historically inaccurate. This was after the matinee. At the evening show I carefully looked over the film and came to the conclusion that, from my faint memories of American History, their criticism was warranted. On picking up the current "World" a few days later, I find an editorial notice corroborating our decision. Now it seems to me that here is something to be looked into by the ——— Company. If they want to make educational pictures and, at least, here is one exhibitor who wants them and wants 'em muchly, why not pick out a subject that can be accurately rendered into photoplay form. I don't mean to say that this picture did us any great harm with the educational authorities, for they liked some parts of the picture and said so. The thing was that they won't take the educational value of the film SERIOUSLY until the films are made with as much attention to detail as the textbook used in the schools. We have done a lot of good work out here in the cause of "uplifting" the "Jiggle-pictures," as my chum calls them. I had an instance here the other day. A man who had talked loudly and wildly about the depraving effect of moving pictures, was induced to come into the theater and I immediately sold him ten tickets for "Lillian Walker Night." One view of our theater and the general atmosphere of the place convinced him that he was in error in knocking the whole business. We have a string of automobiles in front of the theater every night and the cranking-up when the show is over is some noise. So we have as "High-class" (I hate the word), an audience as could be expected. Therefore we get the kind of criticism that is as fair as could be desired.

Three reels of "Two Orphans," with a reel and a half to an "orphan," may not be as uplifting as "His Mother's Shroud," but the production of "Two Orphans" as I saw it produced in my own home town, was the greatest success, artistically, financially, box-officially and satisfied audience-ly that I can imagine or desire.

Mr. Jennings Had the Floor.

Mr. Wilson takes his point well. A historical subject should be accurate, else it should not be released as a historical subject. We did not see the film, but imagine that the director slipped up after the working script was made. Historical and propaganda films should be made under the direct supervision of some one better informed than the average director.

But this is a matter that does not lie with this department and H. L. Jennings of the Lyceum Theater, Monroe, La., has the floor to say:

> Dear Sir:—Enclosed you will find a number of dodgers, which will show you how I pick my feature reels from the regular releases. In most instances I have taken the hints from your "Comments on the Films," which I keep from week to week in a filing cabinet. As I get my program one day in advance, I have twenty-four hours in which to advertise any good one-reel subject that arrives. I use about two of these features a month, and my patrons are always satisfied and turn out in large numbers when I get my bills out among them. I have a reliable man in my employ who distributes these circulars and each one reaches some member of the household where it is left. I am also enclosing you a musical program that my orchestra, of four pieces, rendered Easter Sunday. The only criticism received on this program was from a minister here, who caused a letter to be published in the local papers condemning such programs on such an occasion. We arrange a program of this nature once a month. Every evening after each show we render a selection or overture from the well-known operas, which adds considerably to our entertainment and has proven very popular with our audiences, in fact, our music is 50 per cent. of our entertainment.
> The Moving Picture World has my best wishes always, for it has certainly helped me considerably in my advertising campaigns, and in every instance has filled the house. I also advertise in the local papers, using four inches daily, accompanied with a quarter to a half column reader. Have discontinued singers, as I find good music and pictures are all the public wants here, especially when you have a large, cool and comfortable house as the Lyceum is.

Let Us Post You.

Mr. Jennings uses the one-reel feature and makes good. He takes his tips from The Moving Picture World and plays safe. But the point is that he makes good with the one-reel because he does not overwork the feature idea and because he has educated his house to the one-reel feature. We believe that any manager who does his advertising work carefully and intelligently can do as well. Now and then he'll get a chance to double reels as in the Vitagraph's, The Cave Man and The Serpents, the latter being a continuation of a vivid and unusual reel.

Comment on feature releases printed in advance of publication and the regular Comments on the Film are not used to fill up space nor to please the makers. They are published for the benefit of the live-wire exhibitor that he may keep in touch with the product and the house manager who passes these articles by in the belief that they are merely presswork, is losing a lot of sound information. These stories are all written by staff members and not by the press agents of the manufacturers, and it is here that you will find the tips that will make your one-reel features. Make a note of the page number that you may find your material quickly and you'll not be apt to go far wrong.

Just One, But Right.

Mr. Jennings sends a number of these one-reel feature throwaways. They are not pretentious in appearance, being printed on cheap colored stock, but they are well displayed and they generally stick to the one film and try and make you want to see that.

By holding back the circulars for the better-than-usual releases, Mr. Jennings gives them an importance and by playing fair with his patrons he holds their confidence and they regard the appearance of the sheets as notice that there is something worth while to be seen at the Lyceum. It doesn't pay to turn in false alarms. Play fair and you'll be dealt with fairly.

Here are the two sides of the one-reel subject.

The answer seems to be that if you do not overwork the idea, play only the real features and have them boomed, you can get more than the usual profit from the unusual one-reeler.

We fancy that most of the Kalem Egyptian and Holy Land pictures will come through in one reel on account of the rule of the Patents Company regulating the number of two and three reel releases. To argue that these will not be features would be foolish.

Overlooking an Opportunity.

The Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton writes:

> Here's something that may be of interest to your exhibitors. It certainly is to the exhibitors' patrons, who are having to suffer. I saw yesterday Edison's Dream Dances. Edison has been very careful to call attention in the leader before each dance to the proper music to be played, and in the "Kinetogram" he has also called attention to this fact. When I saw it the pianist played anything except the suggested music, and half the time did not even choose music that was in the tempo of the dance. You can imagine the effect. The result on the audience was that dozens of people commented audibly their dissatisfaction, and at least three left the theater vowing in language I won't repeat, that they would never go there again, but would find a place where the films weren't murdered.

This has reference to some New York house, but which one Dr. Stockton does not state. It certainly seems to be gross carelessness not to fit the music to the dance when the proper style of music is in the film itself. It is discouraging to a manufacturer to go to no small trouble only to find that he has wasted his time.

Reels in Sections.

J. W. Andrews, of the Grand Theater, Bessemer, Ala., sends a common paper bag of the size known as the half-pound, which has on both sides this legend:

This Contains a Bag Full of Information about the Grand Theater.

Inside is a white sheet 5x6 inches and a strip of seven frames of film. The film arouses interest and it is pretty certain that the sheet will be read to learn about the film. It is a straightforward talk on the house and the way it is run, starting with this announcement of policy:

> The Management—"Our Patrons must have the best." This motto was adopted by the manager at the time of opening this theater and has been, and will be, rigorously pursued at all times regardless of cost, never at any time sacrificing quality for quantity. It is our aim to conduct a motion picture entertainment on a higher plane than has ever been attempted in this district. In other words, a SHOW THAT YOU WOULD CARRY YOUR MOTHER TO SEE.

Service, orchestra and ventilation are dealt with, and then:

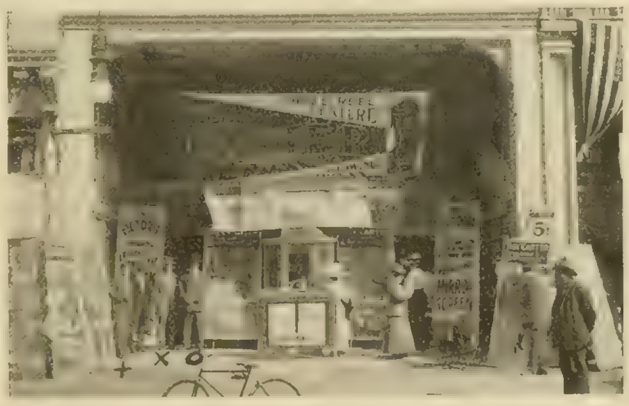
> The little piece of film attached to this is just to give you an idea of what a motion picture looks like. To see them presented properly, You Must See Them At The GRAND.

The Photograph.

The cut this week is the special display at the Victoria Theater, Harrisburg, Pa., for Nick Carter. The entrance seems to be rather too well filled with signs, but they appear to have brought the business.

Unless the transient trade is depended upon, the overloaded lobby is apt to prove a mistake. A couple of frames well placed and boards on either side of the entrance will create a better impression and give you more space.

At best the average lobby is shallow and unimposing and to crowd the limited space with all sorts of signs, posters and frames is a mistake, unless you have no established clientele. It is a grave error to let any feature or film go unannounced, but to spread the display all over the place is an error still more hurtful.



There are several sorts of three sheets which give space for strips with the titles of each release on both Licensed and Independent sides and these program posters will do more for your house than an overloaded lobby with a mass of To-day, To-morrow and Coming Soon strips that leave the passer by in doubt as to what he will see if he enters. The posters are inexpensive. They can be replaced by a home-made device. If you use printed sheets try spar varnishing them. It will brighten the colors and keep them fresh, but it is about as cheap to get new paper as to use the varnish. The Japanese will spend an hour arranging one flower in a vase, but they get a better effect than they would from a mass of flowers thrust into the receptacle without regard to color, mass or harmony.

By all means use posters, but do not overload the entrance. If you have not ample room in your lobby try putting them up and down the street.

THE PHOTOPLAY MARKET.

The Introduction of a Series of Selling Announcements That Each Photoplay Writer Should Tabulate for Future Reference.

SHORTLY after this department was inaugurated, we promised to keep the author in touch with the producer's needs, but until now we have given this information piecemeal. Last week each company in the two distributing companies, as well as the Majestic, received a postal card asking their reeds and suggesting these classifications:

Eastern drama. Western drama. Melodrama. Comedy drama. Mexican plays. Spanish plays. Military plays. Seacoast plays. Light comedy. Short farce. Full reel farce. Costume plays. In the replies those not desired have been eliminated. It will be the purpose of this department to query the editors every few weeks, keeping note of any changes in demand in the meantime.

We would suggest that each of these answers be filed on a catalogue card or pasted on the leaf of a small loose-leaf memorandum book, the old material giving place to new as occasion may demand. In this manner you will find yourself in possession of an invaluable selling list.

Companies not listed will be given space if they will state their wants clearly.

Here is the first installment:

REPUBLIC. (I. Bernstein, Editor), 145 West 45 street, New York City. Wants light comedies, short farces and full reel farces. Particularly interested in full reel farces. Can use southern dramas of the Civil War in which bodies of troops are not required. Independent.

GAUMONT COMPANY. (No Editor), Congress Avenue, Flushing, L. I., New York. Not producing in the United States. It is reported that they will produce American pictures as soon as the Solax Company removes to Fort Lee, but this is not officially verified. Independent.

LUBIN MANUFACTURING CO. (Lawrence S. McCloskey, Editor), Philadelphia, Pa. Can use Eastern and Western dramas, melodramas, comedy dramas, Mexican and seacoast stories, light comedies, short and full reel farces. Licensed.

VITAGRAPH CO. OF AMERICA. (E. V. Breuil, Editor), East 15 street and Locust Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. Can use Eastern and Western dramas, melodramas, comedy dramas, Mexican and seacoast stories, light comedy and half reel farces. All communications should be addressed to the Manuscript Department and not to the editor. Licensed.

THE KALEM COMPANY. (Phil Lang, Editor), 235 West 23 street, New York City, will be pleased to consider strong plays of modern American life, full of action and suitable for production in New York and California. Are not at present producing plays requiring Indian characters or the proverbial ranch and mining environment. Therefore the subjects handled by the California company do not differ a great deal from those made in New York, except that exterior settings are used wherever possible. Writers who supply subjects regularly for this California company meet with success by keeping in mind the personalities of Miss Alice Joyce and Mr. Carlyle Blackwell, the leading players, and Mr. William West and Miss Jane Wolfe, who portray the character roles.

Melodramas which are true to life and an occasional railroad subject will be gladly considered, as well as lively half-reel comedies. Licensed.

RELIANCE CO. (George W. Terwilliger, Editor), 540 West 21 street, New York City, wants Eastern dramas, melodramas, comedy drama, seacoast stories and full reel farces. It might be added that the company has the use of a ship for the marine pictures. Independent.

IMP FILMS CO. (Herbert Brenon, Editor), 515 West 56 street, New York City, wants Eastern and Western dramas, comedy drama, seacoast stories, light comedy, half and full reel farces. Independent.

THOMAS A. EDISON, INC. (Horace G. Plimpton, Manager Negative Production), 2826 Decatur Avenue, Bedford Park, New York City. Mr. Plimpton writes: "I really cannot indicate in such a general way what subjects we want or what we do not want. So far as we are concerned, it is more a question of the particular plot than the classification. For instance, certain melodramas we have made very successfully. On the other hand, a different type of melodrama would be found to be quite unacceptable. The same thing applies generally through the list." Licensed.

REX MANUFACTURING CO. (B. P. Schulberg, Editor), 573 Eleventh Avenue, New York City. Can use Eastern and comedy dramas. Mr. Schulberg adds: "We are particularly anxious to obtain dramas of domestic life; domestic problems and their solution." In a recent letter to a photoplaywright the Editor explained that they did not want scenes in bar rooms, gambling or similar environment. Independent.

SOLAX COMPANY. (Editor not stated), Congress Avenue, Flushing, N. Y., wants good ideas in comedy and thrilling dramas. Independent.

BISON FILM CO. (Richard V. Spencer, Editor), 1719 Allesandro street, Los Angeles, Cal. Special attention is called to the fact that the company is again in the market for one reel subjects as well as the two-reel specials they have been producing. They are in the market for Western cowboy comedies, cowboy stories, bandit stories, Indian and settler stories, Indian and military stories, mining stories, trapper and Indian stories and Western types generally. Independent.

PATHE FRERES. (Editor not stated), 1 Congress street, Jersey City Heights, N. J. Can use Eastern and Western dramas, melodrama, comedy drama, military and seacoast stories and short and long comedy stories. Stress is laid upon the fact that only American stories are desired. Licensed.

Other reports will follow next week.

Here's Another One.

Mr. David Horsley, President of the Nestor Film Company, writes, from the Hollywood, Cal., studios, under date of May 2nd:

> I am enclosing you herewith a communication received to-day from Mr. Edward Ferrucci, of Malden, Mass., and a copy of my reply thereto.
> The Scenario in question was received here on April 22nd and was rejected on first reading as being unsuited to our needs, aside from other defects in composition, and this letter which he wrote regarding it was written on April 26th, so you can readily see that he had not allowed sufficient time to elapse after sending the scenario to get a reply, even had we replied on the day of its receipt. His threats about suing are really funny and I await with interest to learn the outcome of his suit against the Vitagraph Company.
> I also note with considerable amusement the closing line of his letter. "I await your answer in four days to come," not meaning by that the style of English he uses, but the utter lack of knowledge he displays as to the length of time it takes for a letter to go to California from the Codfish state, and get a reply.

This is the letter:

> Dear Sir:—I have sent you a photoplay some time ago and I have not heard from you. please let me know if it is worth anything, and if it is not, please send it back as the Solax people want it. so you better take it, while I am giving it to you for $5 you will never get an other bargain like that from no scenario writer. I have a few funny comedies here if you want to see them let me know soon as possible and I'll send them to you. please don't forget to send back that Vindicated if you do not want it. I need it. I hope you don't try to play dirty on me if you do I'll do the same as I did to the Vitagraph people I sued them for making my picture, without sending me my money, so please not try to do the same thing or then I shall do the same thing to you. Let's hope not I wait your answer in four days to come.
> yours Truly, EDWARD FERRUCI,
> 101 pleasant st., Malden, Mass. Star Theater.

And here is the Nestor reply:

> In reply to your discourteous letter of April 26th, would say that your scenario "Vindicated" was returned to you on April 24th as unavailable for our present needs.
> We are accustomed to doing business with scenarios writers on a basis of mutual courtesy and respect, and if your letter of the 26th is a sample of your way of doing business we do not think that the volume of transactions between yourself and this company will ever be voluminous enough in the future to clog the mails.
> Wishing you all the success you deserve, I remain,

We think that the calibre of this author will be shown by his letter, if the printer has followed the copy given. He is ignorant even of the rules of punctuation and capitalization, and yet he presumes to pose as a writer. If that were not sufficient, the fact that he expects to get a reply in four days would seal his fate. It would require at least five days each way.

This letter is not printed merely that you may have a laugh at the expense of the Malden maker of masterpieces. Some of you who have laughed at the letter may have been guilty of the speed that does not make for haste. We are printing this letter for the information of other Editors of Photoplays and as a horrible example to authors. Whether you want your answer in four days or four weeks, the idea is the same. Take your time.

This is the time of year when seeds are put into the ground to germinate and eventually fructify. Perhaps you've been one of those who dug the seeds up at the end of a week to see if they were growing. It's discouraging to the seed; very discouraging. Give it a chance.

Regard your photoplay as a seed planted in the more or less fertile soil of some editorial office and don't dig it up. Give it a chance.

May 6th we got a check for a fiction story mailed January 20th. We were rather surprised to see it so soon. We knew that in the course of time a check would come and we didn't worry the editor. We knew he had it and we knew he knew he had it and we let it keep on growing until it sprouted a check. The time you take writing about that script that has been gone eight weeks might more profitably be spent in writing another story. Try it. It's a fine way.

But if you do write don't make an ass of yourself. Don't threaten suit and don't make the editor laugh by telling him that another company wants it. He knows as well as you do—perhaps better—that you have no line on the other company's need of this particular story. You only make yourself ridiculous and "get in bad."

This illiterate and ill-advised author is both amusing and irritating, but while you are laughing ask yourself if you've never done something along the same lines. If you have not, you're an author.

What a Scene Is.

A correspondent from Connecticut writes:

> May I ask a question as to construction that has sometimes puzzled me? Assume Scene 1 to be a ballroom. The action next centers in one corner of the room—not a bust, but simply a part of the room—then returns to the entire room. Would those two changes be divided into Scenes 2 and 3 or are they all a part of Scene 1?
> I think few photoplaywrights have sufficient technical knowledge of a camera to be always certain just what constitutes a scene.

Technique of the Photoplay says: "In each scene only such action is carried as is played in a given setting at a given time and "for photoplay purposes it may be accepted that a scene is all of the action occurring in a given setting without stoppage of the camera."

To take the case in point as a "for instance," the action occurring in the ballroom would be made first. All of the action occurring before the action in the corner would be made first. Then, with the camera capped, a couple of feet of film would be passed down through the camera, the lens would be uncovered and all the action occurring after the scene in the corner would be recorded on the film. Assuming that this is the first action of the photoplay, the first of these scenes would be scene one and the second scene three. Now the camera would be moved to come close to the corner where the close-up action occurs and this would be photographed. This would be scene two.

The printing room would take the developed negative and send a print to the cutting room where the operator would join the scenes according to the script. When the production was passed each scene would be numbered on the negative and the prints would be sent to the joining room with scene one marked in front of the first ballroom scene and scene three marked before the second.

The girls whose duty it is to join the prints into one continuous reel of film would see that these were one and three and look for scene two on another strip. That is one of the two reasons for the division of the photoplay into scenes. The other is the convenience of the director.

Where a letter or other insert is used the scene is not broken in two because the camera is not stopped. Suppose, for instance, that John reads a letter. In the action John opens the letter and reads it. Then he puts it down, or tears it up or whatever he has been told to do and goes on to the rest of the action. In the cutting room the producer marks a cross on two of the frames and marks in "Insert No. 3," or whatever the number may be. In the joining room the girl sees the cross marks and inserts the proper number of feet of letter from a long roll of film printed up with that letter between the two cross marked frames.

To put it simply, she joins scenes one, two and three, but she inserts letter number three in scene two, so the two halves of scene two are all one scene, but the two ballroom scenes are scenes one and three.

Welcome to Mr. Brewster.

And now comes Eugene V. Brewster, Editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, to fall in line with the rest of us on Photoplay. In the June issue of the magazine Mr. Brewster writes in his Photoplay Philosopher:

> Hereafter, this magazine will discontinue the use of the word "scenario" when referring to plays from which Motion Pictures are made. Properly speaking, a scenario is but a mere skeleton of a play; whereas the manuscripts from which Photoplays are made are complete sets of working instructions, and are just as much entitled to be called plays as are Shakespeare's "Hamlet" and Sheridan's "The Rivals." Furthermore, I am informed that a scenario cannot be copyrighted; whereas a play, or a Photoplay, can, even though its author believes it a scenario. There has been some discussion on this point, and among those who favor a discontinuance of the word "scenario" are Messrs. Gaskill, "Spectator," Sargent and Wright. As to a substitute word, we prefer "Photoplay," a coined word that has now come into general use. Some, doubtless, will prefer "Picture Play," and perhaps a still better expression will yet be invented.

As to the last declaration, we are open to conviction, but we think that Photoplay will "take a lot of beating," even if Mr. Gaskill prefers Picture Play.

Give It a Name.

Do you know the difference between a comedy and a tragedy?

If you don't, learn.

We saw last week a story that started as a melodrama, became a farce and wound up in a tragedy. The author wanted to know what the matter was.

The farce was more promising than the tragedy or the melodrama and farcical treatment was recommended, but it might have been a melodrama with a farcical touch that spoiled it.

When you get your photoplay done, sit down and look it over, Study it carefully and ask yourself if the treatment is the same all the way through. If you started to paint the side of a house white you would not splash in a streak of red or green occasionally; why make the same mistake in writing? If you have a farce write a farce. If you have a serious play take it seriously. If you get both into one script decide on which is the better and discard the other element. A farce cannot be given the same treatment that a serious play demands or vice versa and the intrusion of farce in dramatic work is not the "comedy relief" you think it is. Drama can be lightened with deft touches here and there, but the general treatment must be dramatic. Farce may have an occasional—a very occasional—serious moment, but treat it carefully. In half reels or even full reels, it is better to leave out the contrast and make it pure farce.

Not Guilty.

In a recent issue we spoke of an apparently inspired editorial in a photoplay publication published in Massachusetts, the publication being the new Scenario Magazine. Its editor asks that the statement be made that the article in question was a reading notice that went with the advertisement and that the magazine "does not boost one association or another and stands for just one thing; a magazine that will work for the uplift, assistance and advancement of the photoplaywright." This is a very good place to stand and we've an idea that the Scenario Magazine will be found standing there some day. Meantime we are glad to know that the magazine does not endorse the anarchistical society even if it does print its advertisements and reading notices.

Sound Sentiments.

William H. Kitchell, who writes photoplays for a living and yet eats three times a day, save when he wastes "supper money" to pay to see the Newark team get licked again, writes these sound sentiments:

> From the depths of my vast experience I rise to observe that every photoplay I've written that deserved a sale was sold, and that if half the magazine editors were half as courteous as nearly all the film editors, the magazine game would be worth trying. With a boost of rates and decent recognition of authorship on the film and in the trade-paper, any writer who can put together the essentials which go to make up a photoplay plot and do it regularly, ought to be able to own a brownstone front and a motor car
> Trouble is with a good many of us, we spend more time in kicking about a fancied steal of a good idea, or the "swipe" of a postage stamp, than we do in working the imagination for good ideas for more plays. For one, I'm going to turn over a new leaf, and sit on the old one.

That's all there is to it. If the photoplays are good they will sell somewhere. Spend your time selling the good ones and don't waste it kicking about the non-success of the bad ones.

We Have Stopped Thinking.

A correspondent wants to know what we think of the "National Association of Scenario Writers, recently started in Philadelphia," and the attitude of the manufacturers toward the same.

We've stopped thinking about that society since H. R. Wright stopped writing us when we asked if he had more than five paid up members—perhaps it was ten we spoke of. We think the manufacturers feel the same way about it, but answering her question further we would express a most emphatic disbelief that the scripts of the membership are given precedence over the work of free lances. It would be more probable that it would be the other way around, if anything.

INQUIRIES

M. A. J.—According to our understanding of the situation, you obtain a general film service license for a house, one of the conditions to which is that only Licensed films shall be used in that house. We do not know about using Licensed service in three or four houses and Independent in the other. It is a condition of affairs that does not appear to have been raised before. Better ask your exchange. "Open market" means that Licensed and Independent films shall run in the same house.

RICHARD ROE—Miss Alice Joyce was the girl in Kalem's "The Outlaw." Charles Clary had the title roll in "The Coming of Columbus." If you are certain that it was Miss Gertrude Robinson in Biograph's "Pippa Passes," we'll "pass" too, for we are not certain, but think it was Mary Pickford.

A. K. H.—The Western Essanay is located at Niles, California. In the "Deadman's Claim." G. M. Anderson, Arthur Mackley, Brinsley Shaw and Frederick Church had the leads. We do not know the present location of the Western section of the Republic company.

C. F. K.—The bullfighter in Lubin's "Mexican Courtship," was Burton T. King. The amateur was Romaine Fielding.

T. deV. H.—Miss Florence LaBadie was the girl in Thanhouser's "Flying

L. B. L.—We have no information as to the cameramen for the Animated Weekly in your section.

THAT JANE SHORE—Miss Hetty Gray Baker writes that Jane Shore, in the C. G. P. C. of that title, is Miss Florence Barker, formerly with the Biograph, and the players of the Priscilla roles. She writes that Miss Barker is under a three-years' contract to the Pathe Freres, but that it is reported that she resigned recently to marry a Russian count.

T. deV. H.—Miss Florence LaBadie was the girl in Thanhouser's "Flying to Fortune," and she "really flew" but how high or how far is not stated. We do not know if Edith Storey is the "real" name of that popular player, and do not consider it any of our business. You'll never be popular if you ask questions like that. We think Miss Daphne Wayne was replaced by Miss Mary Pickford in the Biograph, at any rate, her name does not appear in the roster of those working in the West. This seems to be the list of principals: Wilfrid Lucas, Fred Mace, Mack Senner, Chester Mailes, Dell Henderson, Eddie Dillon, Billy Butler, Charles Avery, Harvey Hyde, "Spike" Robson, Miss Sweet, Miss Clara McDowell, Miss Dot Bernard, Miss Mabel Normand, Miss Mary Pickford, Mrs. Grace Henderson and Miss Kate Tanquary. We agree with you that it is not courteous to withold from the American fans the identities freely disclosed in England, but we do not see that you can help it any by writing to the company.

C. L. H.—We do not think you would stand much chance of a reading unless your script was typed. You can have it typed for ten or fifteen cents a page. If you lack that confidence in it, don't send it out. It will not pay you.

S. L. B.—It was not Miss Mabel Normand who played with G. M. Anderson during the illness of Miss Vedah Bertram, but another Biograph player loaned the Essanay through the courtesy of the director.

E. S. L.—As a general thing you'll have to give a better identification of a character than "the tall girl with black hair who does most of the bossing," but the lady in Eclair's "It Pays to be Kind," seems to be Miss Rolinda Bainbridge, whom you may recall as having been with Edison.

M. B. S.—The Melies Company has not replied to the inquiry. Tom Santschi was Tom Jennings and Herbert Rawlinson, John Lane in Selig's "The Ones Who Suffer." Robert Thornby was the forest ranger in Vitagraph's "Sunset."

M. E. H.—The younger Musician in Majestic's "Opportunity" was Gaston Bell. He also played all of the other parts mentioned. We do not know what has become of Miss Young, nor yet of Miss Rea.

C. A. D.—William H. Crane was the coward in Champion's "The Coward's Flute." George Lessey was Romeo in Thanhouser's "Romeo and Juliet." Miss Viola Alberti was Mary in Thanhouser's "The Taming of Mary." The Bison question will be replied to later on.

M. L. M.—John Charles played Philip in Powers' "Ethel's Sacrifice."

V. P. L.—We do not advise authors to submit their scripts to the English market because there is so little demand for the sort of stories that Americans write, and because the prices seldom rise above five or ten dollars. At the same time the matter of return postage need not cause you inconvenience. Any postoffice will sell you coupons that can be exchanged abroad for five cent stamps. They cost six cents each. Enclose one of these with your script and the office will do the rest. Remember that a five-cent stamp will cover two ounces between here and England.

G. A. Y.—Unless you are in a hurry for those Selig pictures, better take it easy. We are advised that the company is preparing a handsome new set. We think the Lubin post cards are five cents each, but we are not certain.

W. I. B.—Your suggestion that you serve as unpaid assistant in a script department in order to study photoplay writing is ingenious, but we do not believe that the idea would be received with favor by the studio managers. What costs nothing has little value, as a rule.

C. W.—We do not identify "little blonde" ladies. What part did she play?

C. P. C.—The Selig Katzenjammer Kids are two dwarfs.

G. L. P.—You might be able to arrange with the publishers for the use of a copyrighted story, but unless you can think up ideas for yourself it is better not to bother with photoplay as the chance of a sale is very small. The Richard Harding Davis stories are produced by Edison by arrangement with the holder of the copyright.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"HYPNOTIC NELL" (Kalem), May 8.—Miss Ruth Roland plays in this picture a cowgirl who sends for a "How to Become a Hypnotist" book. Let us add at once that she really has no need of such a book. It makes, however, a good situation and she puts good fun into its interpretation. She trys her new art first on the Chink cook—it works. Then the Kalem coon, he whose mouth is like a good, ripe watermellon cut open, comes in for a spell of it. Bashful Bill was hypnotized to more purpose and so was reluctant father who said "Bless you, my children," as out of a dream. The camera work is very fair. It is good entertainment.

"AMERICAN TOURISTS ABROAD" (Kalem), May 8.—This travel topical contains extremely interesting glimpses of Rome, of Pompii and a short glimpse of Egypt. The views were wisely selected and seem of unusual interest. The photography is of the same quality with former Kalem travel pictures. It is very fair.

"AUNT MIRANDA'S CAT" (Edison), May 8.—A comedy with two pairs of lovers. Aunt Miranda (Alice Washburn) had an admirer in her next-door neighbor (Wm. Wadsworth) and her big-eyed niece (Elsie McLeod) had also a sweetheart, played by Edward Boulden. Auntie objected to him. Auntie's admirer objected to her cat. This cat got into a fight on the fence and a brick flung by the older man knocked him out. He then was buried. The younger man found the cat which wasn't dead and brought him back, then blackmailed the older man to persuade Auntie to let him marry the niece. The picture, in spite of its humorous characters and its good situation, seems slow. It really wasn't a full-reel subject. The acting is good, as is the camera work.

"THE EMPTY GRAVE" (Pathe), May 8.—An extremely melodramatic story, which dealing with marital infidelity, although as delicately as possible, would have been most unpleasant; but has a very pleasing child's part. This role greatly relieves it. The child was putting flowers on "mother's" grave, which was empty, when her mother finds her. It aims at pathos and gets over sufficiently to be entertaining. The audience liked it; there is no doubt of that. The camera work, sets, acting and general conduct are good. The scenario is weak.

"THE VIOLIN'S MESSAGE" (Lubin), May 9.—Mr. Arthur Johnson plays, in this picture, a wealthy landlord, in a perpetual grouch. His young wife had died and he can't help mourning for her. Miss Lottie Brisco plays the role of a poor tenent of his, very sweet and good natured, who with her little brother, the violinist, lives in one of his apartments, but can't pay her rent. The object of the picture is to show how sweetness and good spirit are carried, as winds carry clover scent over the fence to the dusty road. It tells a love story. It is effective. The acting is good; the players popular, and the pictures clear as a bell.

"THE STRONGER MIND" (Selig), May 9.—The well-known Prof. Locksley, in this picture, unravels another mystery and recovers gems stolen by the valet. He finds that this valet had been studying hypnotism and uses suggestion to force a confession. We hardly need to point out that all these hypnotism pictures have no educational value. They are good stories. This one is well constructed. The characters are very wisely chosen and act well. The sets and all the ancillary business aside from the main story, are as natural as can be. The story is so well conducted that it convinces and gets a firm grip on the attention. The camera work is excellent. Those two stable servants as well as that cook could hardly have been better.

"WHEN DADDY WAS WISE" (Vitagraph), May 10.—The most prominant feature of this farce comedy is a clever female impersonator. The son, being disinherited by the father for marrying the stenographer, and knowing his old father's one failing, dressed up as a young woman and flirted terribly with his dad. The father saw through it and led the son on for the joke. He didn't expect that his wife, the boy's mother, would come back. The boy had found out too much so Daddy had to give in, in regard to the marriage. It is clever, well put together and well acted. The camera work is very good indeed. It made several laughs.

"TREASURE ISLAND" (Edison), May 10.—We have already very highly commended this truly wonderful picture. New views of that same big ship shown in a recent picture, "Out of the Deep" are given, and it is marvelous how close to the atmosphere of Stephenson's great romance the picture is kept. There are our old friends—one-legged John Silver and his cut-throat crew, Ben Gun, the marooned sailor, Jimmie, and the village dignitaries. It very truly is a fine feature. The camera work is fine.

"OUT OF THE NIGHT" (Essanay), May 10.—It not seldom happens that stories that have been pictured many times, can be used again with much profit. The millionaire has lost his money and the girl has turned him down. He sits drinking and is about to blow his brains out when a tramp, "out of the night" knocks on the window. Invited in, this ragged, dirty man tells his story of hard luck and it gives courage to the clubman. These memories appear as pictured in the air, just above the narrator and his listener. The thread of the story is kept clear and is pretty well acted. The camera work is good.

"THE SQUIRE'S FATE" (Eclipse), May 8.—An old-fashioned melodrama played artistically and beautifully set in rural backgrounds. There is a fine picture of an old stone mill, with its big water-wheel. The mill-yard is interesting with its pigeons, that perch on the wheel when, as in one scene, it is still, and with its little rough garden. Another pretty scene is a bridge, a little below the mill. The squire orders the miller's sacks of flour thrown into the stream from this bridge. The charm of the pictures comes from its costumes, its scenes and its players, not from its story which is trite. The photography is very fair.

"TROPICAL CREATURES" (Eclipse), May 8.—On the same reel is this science picture of small water animals. The audiences won't know much about them. A lecturer could make of the picture a good deal, however. The camera work is fine.

"A LODGING FOR THE NIGHT" (Biograph), May 9.—A very tense and dramatic picture of the old Southwest. It gives a wild night's adventure of an American in and near a Mexican inn. Two men sat behind the reviewer. They seem to have knocked around a good deal. All through the reel, they kept making intelligent comments on it to each other. Their last remark was, "That's some picture." It is indeed full of good things, humor and humanity, and "some picture."

The difference between romance and realism is that one is what the human heart wants and the other is what it gets It is only a rank pessimist who will say that, in real life, they never mix. This picture is a most remarkable mixture of both. The realism comes from the lively care not only in the development of the plot; but in the smallest matters too. The action reveals, for instance, little unexpected flashes of character. Plainly, it was made by a man who sees life with his eyes open, and is a picture to please thoroughly every kind of audience, a Saturday night feature. The camera work is excellent.

"IN QUARANTINE" (Essanay), May 9.—A comedy; the people were still laughing when the curtain was going up for the next vaudeville act. It is a romantic love story as well and satisfies on both counts. The players pleased the audience and their acting gave much freshness to the situation and made many hearty, sympathetic laughs. The photography is very good. It is a very creditable little comedy picture.

"THOU SHALT NOT COVET" (Vitagraph), May 7.—A comedy giving an intimate glimpse of married life. Bunny plays a loving and indulgent, not too indulgent, husband to Miss Lilian Walker's extravagant wife. It certainly tickled the audience. The situation develops from the wife's coveting a bracelet that costs $250. Her husband will pay $150 for a Christmas present. The wife tries to trick him into getting the bracelet; but, through the funniest kind of bad luck, she loses both ways. Camera work is as good as Vitagraph pictures usually are.

"THE SERPENTS" (Vitagraph), May 8.—We have already printed a review of this picture. It is set in the same backgrounds and costumes as "The Cave Man," of last month. The story is more complicated and not at all poetical; but it may be a more popular picture, as it is of rougher fibre. The camera work is not as good as in "The Cave Man."

"FINDING THE LAST CHANCE MINE" (Melies), May 9.—A good picture, telling an unusually interesting Western story, which is pretty well constructed and has much freshness. There's a scene in it showing a wild thunder storm with good lightning effects. The miner's hut is demolished by a tree blown over, which comes crashing through the roof, letting in the rain and storm. It got a good grip on the audience's attention. Good sound effects would help the storm and make it very real. It is a commendable release to show. The camera work is pretty good.

"THE PARACHUTE MAKER" (Pathe), May 11.—A melodrama very well played by Paul Panzer, who isn't supported very strongly, except by one or two of the players in the roles of old men; but all the work is fair. The picture depends for its interest almost wholly on a new climax, the escape of a parachute maker from prison by means of a parachute he had constructed bit by bit. He was an honest man in prison for stealing when out of work a loaf of bread for his starving family. The picture is quite artificial; but its climax is well handled and pretty effective. The camera work is good.

"THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD" (Vitagraph), May 11.—A picture showing a miser's heart (Mr. Marshall P. Wilder) and how it was made human by affection through the presence of a child (little Miss Costello) in his cobbler's shop. Mr. Wilder is an inimitable mimic and he shows the changes in the crafty cobbler's heart through facial expression. Little Miss Costello is very winsome. This well-photographed picture is likely to be popular.

"EVERY ROSE HAS ITS STEM" (Edison), May 11.—A good comedy that is fresh, pretty and pleasing. Bessie Learn, with Barry O'Moor and Gertrude McCoy, plays the lead in it. It's a comedy with inner meaning; we mean that it gets a real grip on life, and the spectator watching it knows that it's true. The true, heart-warming smile is never very far from a sigh; and this picture deals with that true humor. It's the kind of humor that spreads out far beyond the limits of the situation. These players are very popular and people will like this clearly photographed, wholesome, comedy picture.

"THE DEAD MAN'S CLAIM" (Essanay), May 11.—A well-made picture in every way, tragic and showing much imagination. It is played by two white men and an Indian. The climax (brought about by the treachery of one of the white men and aided by the natural instinct of self-preservation in a thirsty Indian) comes in the midst of the dry desert, at night with a full moon and silvery, romantic light—a very beautiful picture. This follows a burning day and is, in turn, followed by a day of furnace heat. Knowledge of the claim was the legacy of a dead man. At the end of the last day, three more lives have been added to the list. They lie, one here, one there and one yonder. Then we see the claim in a dry corner of the rocks where there isn't even a vulture. It's a good picture.

"SUPPRESSED EVIDENCE" (Kalem), May 10.—Estimating the probable popularity of these melodramas is like drawing a horiscope. There is nothing to go by except past knowledge of old successes. The audience, here in New York, doesn't often applaud; but we think that audiences outside of New York will applaud this picture vigorously nine times out of ten or oftener. If one asks a New York exhibitor what he thinks of such a picture, he says: "That's a good picture; it is well put together and interesting." Then he adds, "Of course, if one wants to be critical; but." And that but indicates the saving grace. It means that the people are satisfied. Such pictures are built along the well-beaten track. There is nothing new in them; they use the things that have been effective again and again and the producers show good business sense in doing it. They do not expect a great triumph and they don't get it; but, at present, they most surely do produce something of definite and substantial market value. This is well made and well photographed.

"THE SALTED MINE" (Lubin), May 8.—A Western melodrama built along the well beaten track with nothing fresh or new in it, but well put together and interesting, especially as to its well photographed natural scenery.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS, NO. 2" (Selig), May 10.—The same figures and kind of appeal will be found in this picture as in the first of the series. The audience on Broadway, Saturday afternoon, seemed to get much amusement from it. The camera work is fair.

"SEEING NEW ORLEANS" (Selig), May 10.—A pretty well photographed series of interesting views of a city very interesting in itself, a city which probably many people have wanted to visit, but few have had the time and chance to see. This offering ought to be very welcome.

"BRAVE, BRAVER, BRAVEST" (Lubin), May 11.—A farce on a ranch. The situation arises when a romantic, pretty girl visits her uncle's ranch. Three young cowboys try to win her, each by making himself appear as a hero. There is nothing new in it. The audience was amused and seemed to enjoy it. The photographs are good.

"WANTED—A BABY" (Lubin), May 11.—On the same reel is this farce of city life. Its old situation seems still able to make a Broadway audience laugh. They seemed to be much amused. There is a little trick-film business in it. It has the usual Lubin camera work.

"FIGHTING DAN M'COOL" (Kalem), May 13.—A good Civil War time story with pretty well maintained suspense, leading up to a climax in and after a battle up and down a street of a country town. This battle is very interesting. It is opened by a small battery of old smooth bore cannon in action. These are first captured, then, after Dan McCool, a major in the C. S. Army, but not known to the citizen soldiers, because he is on a secret, special mission, takes command, the Union forces are driven back. The acting of the romantic story is dignified and sensible. Beside these qualities, the picture has to commend it, pretty girls, war time costumes, courtly manners and well photographed scenes. The hero is McCool; the villain is a traitor who has been elected captain of the home guard. There's an interesting spy part.

"THE UNEXPECTED RECEPTION" (Pathe), May 9—A character farce that features two white bull pups. It is they who gave the unexpected reception and it is they who provide the rough-house which fills the larger part of the film. The farce is pretty well made and the players often very amusing. The camera work is good. The audience seemed to like it.

"THE SAMURAI SCHOOL" (C. G. P. C.), May 9.—This film, which is perhaps two hundreed feet long, is used to make the reel of full length. It is very instructive and interesting and shows a Japanese school in which the children of noblemen are taught the art of self-defense. This is a very commendable offering; the photographs are very good indeed.

"HENRY IV AND THE WOOD CHOPPER" (C. G. P. C.), May 10.—This is a comedy played by real artists in facial expression and it is very amusing. The audience seemed delighted. It is a colored film showing the bright tints in a sun-splashed forest. It has much beauty and provoked hearty laughter too. The photography is good.

"COD FISHING OFF ICELAND" (C. G. P. C.), May 10.—A first class industrial showing fishing smacks on a tossing sea. The fish seem to be plentiful.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 20," May 13.—A very interesting number with a large number of items, well photographed and full of news. We have printed the list of items in our synopses department.

"THE EYE THAT NEVER SLEEPS" (Essanay), May 14.—A detective story featuring the work of a clever sleuth who runs down a gang of counterfeiters. Judging it by strict standards, it fails to convince strongly; but it is a good, interesting picture. It is clearly and smoothly told, except for just one moment, when the sleuth struggles with his partner and, as one of the gang, gets both into the den. The photography is very good.

"THE BANK PRESIDENT'S SON" (Edison), May 14.—An interesting, well-made melodrama, one that is aimed to amuse the average spectator and one that probably will be popular. The audience watched it with close attention. It has a horse and sleigh race as a climax. Mr. George Lessey plays the president's son; his sweetheart is played by Miss Miriam Nesbitt. Harold Shaw, the bank's cashier; Robert Brower, its president, and Guy Hedlund, in a lawyer's role, have parts in it. The camera work is good.

"LOVE IN THE GHETTO" (Vitagraph), May 13.—A picture dealing with Ghetto life, its problems and customs. It illustrates the work of the matrimonial broker, the schatchen. The characters, with one exception, are not Jewish nor like Jews; but this fact doesn't hurt the picture except that it keeps it from giving any convincing impression of realism. They are sweat-shop characters, and times are hard. The pawnbroker has money and falls in love with the girl, through the schatchen, he offers $500 as a dowery, and the girl's father persuades her to accept. The hero and the girl, who really loves him, are in distress, but fate, at the last moment, proves kind. The acting is good, as is the photography. The reel is certainly interesting, but not powerfully emotional.

"THE TURNING POINT" (Selig), May 14.—A picture that is played strictly along the lines of tragic melodrama, and, at the end, suddenly turns into a farce. This sudden transformation is unexpected; it makes a lone laugh, but it isn't good art. It isn't truly funny and it spoils the impression that the picture might have left. The photographs are fine. The characters act their parts very convincingly. There are many figures in one scene, and their faces give a very realistic impression.

"SCENES IN CUBA" (Selig), May 14.—An excellent scenic, giving a good impression of Cuba. There is one very good laugh. The camera work is fine.

"LOVE OF AN ISLAND MAID" (Selig), May 13.—A romantic melodrama, set on Santa Catalina Island. There is much to commend it. Graceful, pleasing acting; some beautiful natural scenes of sea and land; an interesting story, clearly and smoothly portrayed, will be found in it. It is not a great picture, but one that can safely be depended upon to give good entertainment. The photography shows the backgrounds perfectly, but the faces are not always clear.

"JOSEPHINE" (Cines), May 11.—An historical picture that is both instructive and highly entertaining. A week or so ago, we noticed very favorably a picture by this company called, "Madam Roland." That release showed, very dramatically, the ferment of the Revolution. This, in a way, follows it, and shows the beginnings of the Empire. The same player who took Madam Roland's part in the former plays Josephine in this picture. She is a first-class player. The picture has a very good Napoleon. The story is not quite so dramatic, but it is more gorgeous; in fact, the wealth of material hampers it a little. Both are first-class pictures, and show good craftsmanship and good history. Both appeal strongly to the audiences. They are carefully made, good pictures, and are well photographed. Both are features.

"WHEN THE FIRE BELLS RANG" (Biograph), May 13.—On this very desirable split reel there are two first-class little comedies, fresh, bright, and full of good fun. In the first one the situation is made by the employment by a one-night stand theater man of the whole fire department of a town as supers to play the Roman army. It was fun to see the togas and Roman armor taking out the hose cart when the bells rang, but that is not the best the picture has.

"THE FURS" (Biograph), May 13.—This, like the other, has not only a rich comedy situation, but like its partner, it is very well acted and satisfactorily conducted. Both tickled and thoroughly delighted two large audiences in different houses and fairly representative.

"MAX IS CONVALESCENT" (C. G. P. C.), May 14.—Moving picturedom has missed Max Linder, that genial comedian of the French Pathe Company. He has been very sick. This little comedy, so the first leader says, was enacted by him, with his father, mother and sister, to reassure his old friends, the patrons of moving pictures. We are glad to have him back again. There is no one else who is Max. The picture is a joy forever, and hearty laugh followed hearty laugh throughout the film. Not only is this comedy, which has no definite situation, full of amusement in its whimsical turns and unexpected happenings; but its views of a country place are lovely. There is a very humorous dog in it, and a very amusing trick pony. It is a first class picture. Good health to Max. May he give us many more pictures.

"THE HARVEST IN SICILY" (C. G. P. C.), May 14.—This picture, on the same reel with the one above, makes it a very desirable release. Not only are these views very clearly photographed, but are of unusual general interest.

"TWO WEARY WILLIES" (Cines), May 14.—A farce comedy that kept a large audience in laughter. The situation has been used before and sets forth how two tramps got a dinner. One had a policeman's suit and stood near the restaurant, so that he should be called upon when his pal inside refused to pay. When the pal's time came to mount guard, he fell asleep. The acting, photography, conduct, everything goes to make the picture effective.

"THE SUBSTITUTE" ((Cines), May 14.—An uproarous farce that made much laughter. On the same reel with the above, it also is well acted and photographed.

Independent.

"THE OTHER WISE MAN" (American), May 13.—There was already one wise man in the village of Eucanto. A con man had come and these two were hand in glove and doing a good "business," when the other wise man, this time from the East, appeared. There was nothing mystical about him, he was merely another con man. That was what made him "get wise" to the game at once. The first wise man coveted the hand of the girl, Miss Von Trump. The second wise man (Kerrigan) fell in love with her and blocked the game. The first wise man and the first con man (Richardson) were ridden out of town on rails. The picture is fair throughout, photographs and all. It lacks dramatic grip. The scenario of this situation might have been made much stronger by leaving out some of the scenes that were included and adding some that were not.

"AUTO SUGGESTION" (Solax), May 10.—An automobile comedy. In it a young lady (Miss Marian Swayne) takes a young millionaire (Billy Quirk) for a public chauffeur and enjoys the situation and keeps up the pleasant misunderstanding. She has his phone number to call him up whenever she needs a motor car. The amusing consequences of this, as they are shown by both producer and players, are at once laughable and, except the last few scenes, convincingly probable. It is very well photographed. The latter scenes in which Billy, having been under the drip-pan of the motor and having a very smutched face, gets soot over the girl's face, were built to get a laugh from the gallery. It is not bad, but it isn't really funny and comes in a very amusing picture.

"GRANDPA'S SPECS" (Powers), May 14.—Last summer the Power's Company released some very pleasing farm pictures. In this comedy the qualities will be found again. It is slight, but very truthful. The characters are Grandpa, who puts his specs up on his forehead; Grandma; Sue, a pretty country girl; a little sister, who finds the specs, and the hired men. It is well acted, homely, truthful and thoroughly commendable for every kind of entertainment. This kind of picture is good for church sociables; it would please the old folks.

"A PAIR OF SUICIDES" (Powers), May 14.—On the same reel is this love-tiff comedy. The settings are along a stream in the country. The story is more substantial than the first. Together they make a pleasing, light release, well photographed and well acted.

"WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN" (Champion), May 13.—An artistically produced and photographed picture which may comfort those who are disappointed in love, at least its early scenes may. The later part pictures a happily ending romance. The picture gets over in good shape; but it seems not as strong as it might have been. In fact, the acting, management, lighting and camera work are all very much above the scenario, which seems not strong. The cast and producer were worthy of a better vehicle.

"THE SHERIFF'S ROUND-UP" (Nestor), May 15.—An exciting melodramatic story of the West, in which a clever swindler's scheme to rob a bank is frustrated by the assistant cashier. The picture gives very good entertainment indeed. It has three strong characteristics: It is vigorously dramatic and is so well constructed that there is no weak or unnecessary scene in it. It is well acted and speedy. Lastly, the choosing of back, grounds and the filling of them with the action is very highly commendable. Here is a picture that can safely be relied upon as a feature, even on Saturday night. The camera work is excellent.

"THE COUNTING OF TIME" (Nestor), May 13.—A picture of human fates shown as they are woven by character. Two young men are pictured as starting out in life. One is shown as being a good student; the other as being more elemental and combative. One becomes a lawyer and the other a successful prize fighter. There is a suggestion of wine and women in the latter's experience. In the other's life there seems to be mostly hard work. The fighter reaps the harvest of his path; the lawyer sends him back home. It is a clear and effective tract, not a human drama. There is plenty of room for such; it will be thankfully acceptable to the majority of patrons of moving pictures. It will do good. The camera work is good.

"CUPID'S VICTORY" (Nestor), May 18.—Nestor photography means something; its camera seems to get all the poetry out of any natural scene at which it is pointed. The figures in this picture live and, because the story is good and naturally developed, they live as natural human beings. The situation would not be probable in real life; but, in a comedy, a too strict adherance to cold fact is not demanded. It is entertaining, because it is lively, well acted, well photographed and the situation, more or less of a pipe-dream, pleases a human love of romance.

"ESTUDILLO HOUSE, CALIFORNIA" (Nestor), May 18.—A well-photographed picture of one of California's historic beauty spots. This is a picture that needed coloring; but just as it is, it is delightful. It shows an old Spanish dwelling with its flower gardens, vinyard, etc.

"THE STAFF OF AGE" (Imp), May 11.—A picture to please; yes, delight people who are truly human beings. The staff of age is, of course, youth. In this picture there is a poor old grandad, played very well indeed by George Ober, and his grandson, played excellently by a boy whose name we didn't get. The story is simple, sincere and human. It is beautiful in its photography and makes a very good picture to show.

"LET WILLIE DO IT" (Imp), May 11.—A character farce in which Willie is Mr. Cumpson. He is badly henpecked and furnishes a very amusing situation. The camera work is good. Nellie Force and Grace Lewis support him very well.

"SOULS IN THE SHADOW" (Solax), May 15.—A very melodramatic picture dealing with that strong, fascinating power that some evil people have over others. The picture's sense of mystery is enhanced by clever lighting effects. The story isn't strongly convincing, but it does get a feeling of mystery and suspense over. It is well acted where the leading lady, Miss Blanche Cornwall, is concerned, and pretty well acted by many others in the cast. It is good entertainment; but would have been better, if it had been amplified enough to make it clearer. The camera work is very good indeed.

"JILTED" (Thanhouser), May 14.—A picture giving the love story of a girl who was very sentimental. She left her fiance in New York to visit friends in Florida. The ship was wrecked and her life was saved by a sailor. These scenes are very good. She thought it her duty to marry him. The way out of the difficulty is found through a bit of humor. It is a slight picture, but contains some fine pictures; one is of a skating pond and another is of a flower garden in Florida. Miss Snow, Miss La Badie, Mr. Russel and others appear in it. It is commendable.

"NIAGARA, THE BEAUTIFUL" (Thanhouser), May 14.—This scenic, giving very lovely views of the great cataract, has much to recommend it. The pictures were taken from fresh viewpoints and the prints, on carefully tinted films, are clear and very praiseworthy. It includes a sunset view and a moonlight view.

"THE LITTLE SHUT-IN" (Thanhouser), May 17.—The little shut-in boy (Miss Marie Eline) could see very little of the world—just a glimpse of the sidewalk. His world was mostly feet; but he had learned to judge the world pretty well. A love story begins its spinning in the world of feet outside and he has become interested. This has its villain as well as its hero and the little shut-in, sizing it up, is able to be of assistance. The picture throughout has highly poetic scenes. Its aim is to please the heart rather than to excite deep emotion or to thrill, and in doing this it is very successful; for acting, scene choosing and camera work are all very good. It is excellent entertainment.

"A USELESS SACRIFICE" (Eclair), May 12.—Another pretty village love story, in idyllic backgrounds, by the Eclair French company. It has the intimate, clearly drawn character pictures that other releases of this make have had. These are due to good acting and good photography. It has also the same artistic common-sense in its scene choosing. Its scenes set forth the action remarkably and intensify it. Sorrow is never so sad as when it is found performing the necessary homely duties of life that seem to console the heart; passion is never so wild as among the lovely woods and cliffs. The producer of these pictures seems very able in his handling his effects. This is a tragic and a very commendable picture.

"ARABIAN CUSTOMS" (Eclair), May 12.—These well photographed views are very instructive. The film will be a notable addition to any program.

"FROM THE PATH DIRECT" (Republic), May 11.—A poetic picture in court costume of over a hundred years ago, powdered wigs, silks, satins or brocade. It tells a love story which is set largely in a country estate. Two brothers love the same girl. Several years later, after her marriage to the older brother, the younger man needs financial help which is refused by the older. He attempts to rob his brother's house at night and is wounded. The outcome of it is that the husband suspects his wife's fidelity; but the difficulty is entirely cleared up in the end. The acting is very good. The picture gives pleasing entertainment as a well constructed and well photographed romance. The picture, in this costuming and setting, gives a good relief from the more numerous modern stories.

"THE CONVICT'S SISTER" (Lux), May 17.—A very able picture. Its most noticeable quality, a very well maintained feeling of suspense and mystery, is due largely to the acting of the leading lady. There, however, is a large cast and every one of these plays as naturally and unconstrainedly as can be. This makes the picture, notwithstanding the tense melodramatic situation, remarkably convincing. The stage sets, lighting and camera work are all of high quality and add much to its effectiveness. These sets make beautiful scenes. There is a very well planned effect brought about by the mirrors in one of the set rooms. No review of this picture would be complete without reporting the grace and great beauty of its leading lady.

"JIM'S ATONEMENT" (Imp), May 13.—A picture telling the story of two young civil engineers and the wife of one of them. These parts are played by Mr. Pollard, Miss Fisher and Mr. Lyons. The engineers are friends and the picture deals with a misunderstanding which makes Jim, the husband, jealous. Molly had found a photograph of her husband as a boy. She and the friend conspire to surprise the husband by having it secretly enlarged. The husband, made jealous, throws his friend over a cliff, then he discovers how false are his suspicions. The friend is saved by Jim's going down on a rope. It was taken in a wild, rocky country, and the camera work is very fair. It lacks something of freshness; but is simply and convincingly acted and clearly and smoothly told.

"PRESIDENT INCOG." (Republic), May 14.—A comedy that surely is fresh. It makes use of a character who looks very much indeed like President Taft. This man's name in the picture is Jasper Craft. The scenario writer makes him find himself in a little mining town, with the purpose of ousting some claim-junmpers who have settled on his land. The Republican club of that town had hoped to have the President stop over on his way to 'Frisco and make a speech. They insist that Jasper is Taft and force him to make a speech. To see a man who looks so much like Taft making a Democratic speech (the speech is shown) is excruciatingly funny. This picture is a big feature; it has the quality of humor that will appeal strongly to American audiences. It has nothing offensive. If Mr. Taft sees it, he, we feel sure, he will laugh as heartily and get as much amusement out of it as anybody. We highly recommend it. The photography is good enough.

"ROSES AND THORNS" (Eclair), May 16.—A farce-comedy that gives pretty fair entertainment. Its chief players are two pretty girls, a lot of school teachers and Cousin Tom. Dorothy sends Tom to the station to meet Madge, who is to wear a white rose. The school teachers have been away on a picnic and come back to town on the train Madge missed. Each is wearing a white rose and poor Tom gets arrested. It is light and will please the majority. The photographs are crinkley; this is noticeable in the film of many makers this week. It gives the scenes a misty effect. Mr. J. E. Brulatour, of the Eastman Company, appears, we may add, in this picture himself. He has one of his fine motor cars and acts as chauffeur. He shows his great skill at the wheel.

"ATTACKED BY A LION" (Gaumont), May 16.—Here is a very big feature picture. It tells an exciting story of adventure, set and photographed one may well believe, in Africa, on the desert's edge. It is full of the tensest kind of thrills. To begin with, Arab pillagers attack a ranch occupied by French colonists. There's a telephone and they call up the next settler, a day's ride over the desert. He starts out alone on horseback. He rides fast and recklessly, over rocks and down steep sand-hills. It is he who is attacked by the lion. We had seen two of these in their lair among the rocks. We also had seen where they had killed a cow; a hyena was finishing the repast. These views are big thrillers; but not so tremendous as the views of the king of beasts, when he comes out to attack his prey and is shot dead by the hunter. These scenes ought to have good sound effects to go with them. Again we see the Arabs shooting into the ranch, which is baracaded. The colonists have used their last cartridge and their home is on fire, when the lion killer dashes in among the white-robed horsemen. His help would have been of scant avail had not his wife, soon after he set out, roused the neighborhood. This gives another big scene; the band of French riders on their gallop to bring assistance. The camera work and scene choosing are fine. Their is much beauty in the picture. We overheard some one say, "That's the best picture I ever saw."

"DUCK HUNTING" (Champion), May 15.—This topical was taken along the salt lakes of Utah. These views are very interesting. The emulsion of the print is just a little crinkly; but this doesn't keep some wondrous good shooting from being perfectly clear. The scenery also is good. It is a very good picture.

"BRONCHO BESS" (Champion), May 15.—On the same reel is this Western melodrama without much quality. The leaders are in very badly made doggerel. It is poor, but it is short, and the other picture on the reel is very good. The film is not very clear. It seems to be poor stock. We notice this failing on a number of films this week. The trouble seems to lie with the Eastman people, the maker of the stock.

"THE HATERS" (American), May 16.—Three woman haters and one man hater and then a love story. The girl (Miss Pauline Bush) wasn't a hater of men, but her aunt and guardian was. One of the three woman haters, partners on the ranch (Kerrigan), get up a fever and the niece volunteers to act as nurse. Her presence on the ranch left no woman haters there, and gives the situation more than one suitor. Auntie comes to investigate and there is then no man hater left. This gives two love stories, one romantic and one farcial. It is a lively farce, clearly drawn, well conducted and will be popular. The backgrounds are a California ranch, its rough shack, etc. The camera work is very fair.

"THE LOST RING" (Gaumont), May 12.—A picture in the costume of over a hundred years ago or thereabouts. The settings and backgrounds, although simple, are perfectly in keeping with the acceptable, convincing little story of the lost ring. The young husband sees his wife pick up something and unjustly accused her of refusing to give up the ring that was lost. He finds out his mistake later and goes to her mother's to find her again. It is colored, but not so skilfully as usual. The young wife is very pretty and there are other pretty women in the picture. It is well acted and charming in its grace. The clearness of the picture is perfect.

"PRINCE CHARMING" (Reliance), May 15.—A poetic picture with a fairy tale that a little newsboy with an engaging smile, dreams. It is played exclusively by children under sixteen, and played with charm and grace. The dream takes the "prince" (he becomes Prince Charming) to the palace of the Princess, where there is a grand reception. The guests are clothed in silks and satins with gems and gold lace. It is a triumph, not without a struggle, for the prince, and he wakes up in his shabby little room, but is not unhappy. Here is a feature for children. It will entertain grown-ups. The photography is good.

"THE RECOIL" (Reliance), May 8.—The tones of Reliance photography in recent pictures, seem very closely suggestive of real life, and this is true even when, once in a great while, a scene lacks photographic clearness. A great factory with its environments, serves as the background to this picture. It is a tensely dramatic love story. Labor troubles are utilized but are not brought directly into the story; they and the agitator's attitude toward capital, merely serve as a spring board for it. The crazy anarchist, however, in his desire to be revenged, plots to blow up the works and his unknown son-in-law, the man against whom he is very bitter, and brings into it a terrible climax. Here, the tones of the different scenes is very cleverly managed. We are expecting to see a fearful explosion in one group of scenes. We see the anarchist, now awakened to the situation, and rushing to stop the explosion, in another. These scenes are, on the one hand dark, and bright on the other. Every time the change takes place, it seems for one-hundredth of a second, as though we were about to see the burst of flame. This is the tensest picture we have ever seen. It is terrific. A sure feature. It is a picture to show when a good impression is needed, as in a Saturday night's show.

"THE MISER'S DAUGHTER" (Reliance), May 11.—The miser's daughter is, in the early scenes of this picture, compelled to make "the old dress do," and very pretty she is, indeed, in that same old dress. These early scenes introduce a love story. Later, there comes a greater need of a new dress. The miser's wife takes money from her husband's draw for her daughter and this opens another strongly dramatic situation. It is handled as the Reliance Company usually handles its situations with knowledge of humanity and with imagination. Miss Gertrude Robinson plays the miser's daughter; Mr. Henry Walthall plays the lover.

A FEATURE FILM THEATER.

The beautiful Walker Theater, Los Angeles, Cal., seating 1,000, will open September 1st as an exclusive feature film theater, where only the best feature film productions will be shown at fixed prices of 10, 15 and 25 cents. Each feature film, or set of films, will be given a two weeks' showing, each feature to be extensively advertised. Arrangements are now being made with producers of feature and state-right films to guarantee ten or more weeks in cities west of Denver and New Orleans and the Pacific coast territory, the intention being to send these feature pictures to the different cities intact with a fully equipped corps of managers, agents, lecturers and operators, thus making each presentation first class and perfect in every detail.

Harry (Hm) Scott, formerly with Drew and Campbell, of Celevland, Ohio, Harry Davis, Pittsburgh and recently New York representative of the Mozart circuit, is representing the enterprise, with temporary offices in the Walker Theater Building. The corporation is made up of well known theatrical promoters who, in conjunction with the Walker Theater, are forming a circuit of feature film, one-night and week stand theaters, already having enough to assure more than ten weeks.

Prior to September 1st the exterior and interior of the Walker Theater will undergo noticeable changes and will also be re-christened with a magic name, while all employees, manager, press agents, superintendent, operator, etc., will be women.

THE FEATURE FILM & CALCIUM LIGHT CO.

Among the companies recently formed for the exploiting of motion pictures is the Feature Film & Calcium Light Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., with offices at 127 Fourth Avenue. The company is composed of Ben F. Jones, general manager; Oscar F. Krug, H. J. Smith, George R. Allison, Webb and Clay Berger. All these gentlemen have been connected with the film business in Pittsburgh for several years. The company has the rights for western Pennsylvania and West Virginia for the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company's features and for the features released by the Bison and Eclair companies. A large equipment of machines and supplies of every description is also carried, enabling it to meet every demand from exhibitors.

Comments by World Readers.

Some Criticisms on "The Crucial Test" (Selig).

Men in Alaska when starting on a trip, such as the three prospectors take, do not carry heavy packs on their backs. They use dog teams and sledges, or in the event of "no dogs," use hand sleds to transport provisions. Never do they essay a journey in winter without snow shoes. No man in Alaska was ever known to desert a sick comrade, leaving him to die alone.

Alaska Indians never wear feathers in their hair, nor do Indians in winter travel without the ever-needful snow shoe.

In all my travels in Alaska never have I seen a house built of lumber, and mill trimmings, such as the two partners occupied. Nor are there any stone walls, as shown in the background of the scene, showing the prospect hole. There are many thousands of returned Alaskans, scattered over the United States who will see this picture, and other pictures of Alaska setting. What must be the effect and comment when such gross carelessness is allowed to spoil an otherwise fine picture? W. L. SHANKS.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir: Tell me truly, if you can, why the motion picture people, when they represent an Indian, always do so with a long string of feathers hanging down his back—like the girl with the golden hair?

Imagine, if you can, an Apache plugging over the arid deserts of Arizona, with the thermometer about 125 Fahrenheit, with such a headgear! Well, the only place you would see it would be in these pictures—the real Apache simply ties a red handkerchief around his head and lets it go at that.

As a matter of fact, but few of the American tribes ever wore such a head-dress, and then only on ceremonial occasions, as the eagle's feathers are sacred with all tribes. The headgear, as depicted in the pictures, was really worn by the Cheyennes, or at least some of them, and possibly by the Sioux on occasion. But by very few others. And the dress of the Indian is affected as much by climate and environment as is that of the white man—the dress of the Red man on the Canadian border is entirely different from that of his brother along the Mexican line, just as is the case with the white man similarly situated.

Let's have this thing done right. Let the show people post up a little on the dress of the noble aborigine!—Yours truly,

EDW. N. BUCK,
Editor The Nevadan.

Objects to Press Agents' "Dope."

Phoenix, Ariz., April 18, 1912.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir: All loyal natives of New Mexico—and that does not imply that they are brown of skin and speak in the soft tongue that originally came from Castile—resent the unaccountable ignorance of eastern people concerning the political geography of their country, especially when that ignorance allows itself to be played upon for the sake of a theatrical puff. New Mexico maintains a Board of Immigration, whose duty it is to advertise the fact that there is now a Sunshine State—note the word State—and that it is a good place for people from the East who are running around in circles and hoarsely shouting their disgust at the overcrowded conditions, to come and live where there is room for an entire family to live and have their being at one and the same time.

These remarks, as you will have shrewdly guessed, lead up to something, and here it is.

In your issue of March 23, there is a little write-up about the Powers Company that is a real burr under the saddle blanket. The author, who is—and I'm willing to bet on it—the publicity man for a cheap moving picture troupe, says, "The company came very near being embroiled in a battle that took place near Las Cruces, and only escaped by an exceedingly narrow margin." The "big fight" mentioned could only have taken place in the imagination of the director, and if the "split reel" is circulated, will give an entirely erroneous impression about New Mexico and add to the already appalling list of things that the eastern people don't know about the political geography of the southwest.

Let me give you some facts—the Powers man seems unable or unwilling to do so. Las Cruces is situated about thirty miles north of the international line, and in all postal maps is freely admitted to be in the United States. It is true there are many Mexican people in the neighborhood, some of whom cannot speak English, but all the children are, or have been attending an American school and can pronounce "new" to rhyme with "few," just as well as any New Englander, contrary to the "western" writers who make us say "noo" and "yuh."

Las Cruces has a Y. M. C. A. that is in every way as modern and down to the minute as that in any eastern town. It is the site of the State Agricultural College, and the men at that school wear their hair just as long and get every bit as excited over the efforts of the football team as the most wild-eyed Yale or Harvard man that ever responded to the cry, "Now fellows, all together—three times three for the team!"

Here is a significant fact. Some time ago a Massachusetts firm sent a shipment of school-books—mostly geographies—to New Mexico, with all provisions, made to assess duties at the customs house they imagined must exist somewhere about Raton or Trinidad, which was to them on the frontier of a foreign land. Friends of mine in Chicago have written me asking if I had been in any danger at the cannonading, when Juarez fell, and if I would stroll out on the battlefield and pick up a few empty shells or fragments of the slain from the bloody scene of carnage, to send to them as souvenirs! I submit that the writer of that "advertisement" might pick up a neat sum on articles such as I have mentioned. As do all other Southwesterners, I prefer to have my country known as a real, honest to goodness up-to-date part of the U. S. A., and every bit as loyal a nephew of old Uncle Sam as any other son of Columbia.—Yours for realism,

LYLE ABBOTT.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

THAT OLD MACHINE.—On a great many occasions I have pointed out in the columns of this department the fact that the income at the box-office very largely depends on the excellence of what appears on the screen.

It is, of course, impossible to put a perfect picture on the screen unless the scenes be well acted, the film well photographed and perfectly perforated. Something else is required beyond this, however, before the picture will be a good one, and that something consists of excellence in the operator himself, and perfection in the projection mechanism. It is of the latter I propose to speak at this time.

A projection mechanism costs from $80 to in excess of $125, according to the kind you buy. That is, of course, quite a sum of money, and one does not care to pay it out unnecessarily. It must be remembered, however, that if the receipts at the box office are cut down by, let us assume, $5.00 per day through faults in the projection due to imperfection of the projection mechanism, it would only take about 25 days to buy the best mechanism on the market with the money lost through continuing the old one in service. If the loss be only $1.00 a day, it would take but about four months to pay for a new machine. No intelligent manager will question the fact that any injury to the excellence of the picture will in some degree affect box office receipts, and it will therefore be seen that, from the dollars and cents point of view, it is not a good policy to keep an old worn out mechanism in service.

I personally know of mechanisms that have been in service for five years. Of course, all the parts subject to any wear whatever, have long since been renewed, and the machine has been to the factory anywhere from two to a half dozen times or more, for a general overhauling. You may say, this being the case, the machine has been kept in fine condition, and is as good today as a new one. That is to a considerable extent true, but do not overlook the fact that there are improvements continually being made in projection mechanisms. That machine of five years' age could not and did not deliver the results on the screen which are possible with the modern up-to-date projector, therefore this man, although he has probably paid out more than the price of a new machine in repairs, still has an old, out-of-date mechanism which is losing him money at the box office every day it is continued in service.

Now please do not understand from this that I advocate the purchase of a machine every time some part wears out. I don't. On the other hand, however, I am not a believer in the continuation of a mechanism in service for any extended period of time for the reasons just set forth. It is a paying proposition to discard an old mechanism as soon as there is an improved type on the market, which delivers better results on the screen than the old one, remembering that "better results on the screen" consists of several things, one of which is absence of flicker, another one, steadiness of the picture, and a third one, few or no stops.

It would seem almost unnecessary to call attention to the vital necessity for keeping the projection mechanism in perfect repair while it is in service. I believe that the number of times I have dealt with this particular matter in the department has had some effect; at any rate, I notice that managers are more and more realizing the importance of keeping the machine in good repair, and it has become the exception, rather than the rule, to find an old, worn out, ram-shackle machine, almost ready to fall to pieces from lack of repairs. This is partly, however, due to the increased knowledge of the operator, too many of whom did not, two or three years ago, themselves realize the importance of keeping their machine in good condition.

I cannot conceive of the condition under which it would pay to run with a machine in bad repair. Worn parts, are not conductive to accuracy in results, and lack of accuracy in results, of course, means a dissatisfied audience. To sum this whole matter up, I would again advise managers to discard out-of-date mechanisms, and keep up with the procession in the matter of improvements; I would also advise them to in no case to haggle with an operator over a needed repair. If the machine is in need of a new part, don't argue about it, but get it, and stand not on the order of doing it. But let me once more caution you, in this connection, to get your repair parts from the machine manufacturer himself. Don't buy machine parts from dealers, unless those parts are stamped with the name of the manufacturer, or bear his trade mark impresses in the metal.

There are unscrupulous parties who make machine parts in imitation of those put out by the various machine manufacturers, but these parts are almost invariably of poor material and inferior workmanship. They are cheaper, but that is the only thing they have to recommend them, and if a sprocket on which you save 50 cents, costs you $5.00, in loss of business at the box office, you have not gained very much.

There are, of course, a few manufacturers who put out products which bear their own name, such as the "Rose Ring Sprocket," and "Levezzi's" products, who should not be included in the above condemnation. I am not speaking of the man who manufactures a machine part which is his own invention, or which he advertises under his own name as being his own product. That is perfectly legitimate, and the chances are that the part will be well made and of good material, since otherwise he could not hope to do very much business. The parties to whom I refer are those who imitate the goods of others—who make and sell, usually to unscruplous dealers, sprockets and other parts for the various projection mechanisms at reduced prices and reduced excellence, well knowing these parts will be resold as the genuine. There is more of this business done than you can imagine, Mr. Exhibitor, and I therefore, advise you to purchase the machine parts directly from the machine manufacturer, or at least from reputable, reliable dealers, remembering that cheap machine parts are imitations, and about the most expensive thing, in the long-run, that you can possibly buy.

LAMPHOUSE CHARGED.—X. Y. Z., Pa., (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "We are having trouble with our lamp house becoming electrified and are unable to locate the source of trouble. We use a Powers six machine and have lamp house that goes with it. Purchased the equipment in March, 1911. Use A. C. current; have 73-foot throw, and use a Fort Wayne Compensarc. Wires come up through the asbestos floor, right underneath the machine, through conduit, and we have No. 6 wires running to machine and Compensarc. I clean the lamp house about once each week, take lamp apart, use emery paper on the carbon holders and keep them bright, cut off the charred ends of the wires inside lamp house about every two weeks. Clean all dirt from bottom of lamp house and keep lamp greased with vaseline weekly. Can find no place where insulation of wires is bad, but upon reading back over the Projection Department, I noticed that the mica washers and mica in which the screws are embedded, which fasten the carbon arms to lamp proper, should be renewed. I examined these mica washers and screws and found one of them a trifle loose and one of the washers underneath screw half off. I put on a thicker washer, and also embedded the screw in mica in the hole where it is screwed and we still have the trouble of a charged lamp house. Operator thinks that it is worse when he puts his shoe against the piece of conduit projecting through the floor. Have a Johns-Manville booth. Can you offer a suggestion that might help us to overcome this difficulty?"

It is somewhat difficult to determine just what may be the cause of your lamp house being charged. Are you sure that one of the fine strands of wire of the asbestos cable is not touching the lamp house wall? This sometimes happens and it makes a most effective ground. Carbon dust settling on top of the lower carbon arm of the lamp also is a prolific source of grounds. It forms a sort of bridge across the insulation. If the insulation of the lamp arm is faulty I would advise that you send to the N. Power Company and get new insulation for the joint, though possibly you can procure mica right there at home, which will serve as well. You could test the insulation of the joint in several ways, but the best method is by using a magneto. Take the lamp out and take it to the power house and they will test the insulation with a magneto, or otherwise. It is also possible that there is trouble at the point where the wires enter the lamp house. Place a ring of mica around the wires (both of them) where they enter the lamp house. If that stops the trouble, then you know where it is and can install permanent insulation in the holes. Very likely the reason the operator finds the shock to be heavier when his foot is against the conduit is that the conduit is grounded and is a better conductor than the operating room floor. Most likely if he touched the conduit with one hand and the lamp house with the other the shock would be still heavier. In one of the foregoing suggestions I believe you will find your trouble. The conditions is not dangerous, but is highly unsatisfactory and thoroughly unpleasant for the operator; also it injures the light, or is likely to. I must certainly commend you for keeping things in such good shape. However, I would recommend that you procure a can of graphite from the N. Power Company, No. 90 Gold St., New York City, with which to lubricate your lamp. A can (75 cents) will last a year or more and it is the best thing with which to lubricate a lamp. It is a lubricant that will not burn off.

TRAVELING EXHIBITORS.—Mr. Charles Conant, traveling exhibitor and moving picture operator of six years' experience, writes from Meredith, N. M., enclosing the accompanying photograph and asking what I think of his advertising scheme for a traveling show. The advertising display is very neat, and if the show itself is in keeping with the banners, then Brother Conant certainly deserves success. Neighbor Conant incloses a complimentary ticket. Many thanks. Will run over and look at the show some night—maybe.

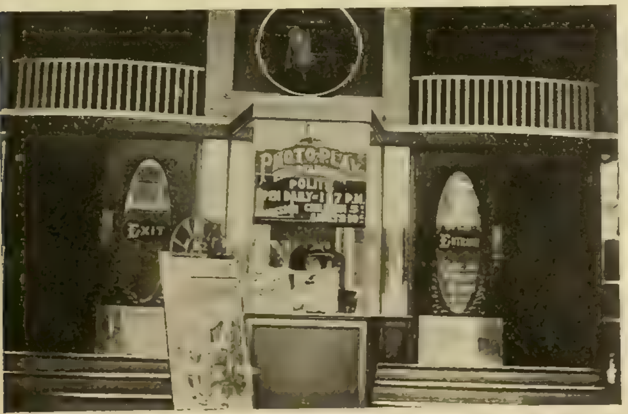
DIRECT CONNECTED GENERATOR.—Mr. P. C. Taylor, Jr., Mgr., Divie Theater, Caruthersville, Mo., asks if there is a direct connected D. C. or A. C. engine-generator set on the market, suitable for moving picture work, and asks me to forward enclosed postal cards to manufacturers, if I know of any. Wants to know if a generating outfit would be suitable for a road show through central Missouri.

While there are several direct connected outfits, designed for moving picture work, made and sold in England, I do not know of any in this country; therefore cannot forward the cards. There is, I believe, a field for such a set in this country. As to a generating set being suitable for road attraction through central Missouri: I do not know about that. The country in central Missouri is mostly rather hilly and rolling, and the roads are none too good. I should imagine you might get hung up a good many times when the weather is bad. I think an automobile, similar to the outfit owned by Mr. E. G. Kay, of Snohomish, Wash., of which a photograph was published in the department some time since, would be far more suitable for that kind of work. Brother Kay had a touring car, upon which, in a convenient position, was mounted a generator. He reported that the outfit worked perfectly.

A SUGGESTION.—Ark., (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "As regards Somerset, Pa., May 4th issue, I do not want to butt in, but if his arc operates well for ten minutes and then trouble begins, I believe if he examines his mica insulation he will find that a short is formed by carbon dust, or at least that he has a ground of some kind. It may not be due to carbon dust, but a ground may occur in several ways and is the cause of many troubles, as I have found from experience. And now, Mr. Richardson, what do you think of using A. C., as per enclosed sketch? I have never tried the scheme, but of course it would require a special carbon arm. It if would work, however, what a God-send it would be. Will some of our chemist friends tell us what effect soaking carbons in sulphur, or sulphur and salt, would have?"

What you say concerning the matter of grounds is quite correct. It did not occur to me that the trouble of Somerset might be due to that particular thing; still it is quite possible, and Somerset will please take note and test it out for ground. As to the sketch referred to, it is exceedingly difficult for me to comment on the same, inasmuch as it was not included in the letter, and while my field glasses are quite a good pair, still they are not powerful enough to allow me to examine a sketch 1,500 miles away. Will the chemist friends kindly supply the desired information as regards sulphur. The effect of salt soaking I believe, has already been set forth by two or three writers, so far as the chemical end of it is concerned.

AN ODD FRONT.—Marshall, Tex., sends in the accompanying photograph, which is one of their three houses, the equipment of which is strictly up to date. The house shown is to be remodeled, and will have a seating capacity of 500. I publish the picture largely on account of the odd appearing window in the operating room. Note the man-behind-the-gun up there, with his arms akimbo, watching the photographer. Probably the machine was not running. If it was he should have been industriously engaged in looking the other way. The young lady down below seems to be half girl and half hat, though, of course, the former half is the more desirable. If she uses the hat to hold the cash and gets it full every day, then the house must indeed be prosperous.



A CAUTION.—Mr. J. T. May, Bartlesville, Okla., sends in $1.50 for copy of the hand-book. He says: "If it is half what I have heard it is, you should charge twice as much for it. I desire to caution operators who may invent an improvement of any kind, which is worth anything commercially, that they should not send to the trade journals for publication until same has been protected by patent. I sent in an idea for publication in the department some time ago, and a certain well-known machine works copied the same; also they have copied inventions of another party with whose case I am personally acquainted. The idea of mine was a three-wing inside shutter for a well-known machine. You favored me by printing a description of this, also a drawing of it about a year ago. I was not able to patent it at the time, and did not suppose any responsible party, such as the one in question appears to be, would do anything of this kind. I intend to take the matter up and see if I can not obtain legal redress."

I thoroughly agree that it is not advisable for operators to publish their ideas before protecting the same, provided they believe them to be commercially valuable. I must say, however, that very few of the ideas, such as the one referred to, would have any appreciable commercial value to the operator. It is an open question whether a three-wing inside shutter, such as you described a year ago, would have sufficient sale to reimburse you, considering the cost of advertising, manufacturing, etc. Personally I do not believe it would. You see there are a number of things to take into consideration, not the least of which is the fact that almost any operator can make that kind of a shutter himself, and very few, I think, would buy it. If they wanted one, they would make it. Therefore I don't think the parties who appropriated your ideas, if they were appropriated, will gain much by it, and if they do, it does not follow that you yourself would have gotten anything out of it anyhow. However, while not at all disputing your contention, let me say to you that the fact that some one has put out a shutter similar to the one which you invented, does not necessarily prove that they have appropriated your idea, although it naturally leads to that supposition. The party might possibly have been experimenting on the same thing, and he might have done this long before you did it too. I mention this not only because it is a fact, and to save you from spending money or time in an endeavor to secure redress, but because I am very sure that you would not be able to get redress, since you could not possibly prove that he did not have this idea, even before you had it, whatever your belief in the matter might be. Now Brother May, please do not be offended at what I have said. I have simply dealt with the matter as I see it. A great many operators have ideas which are in themselves of more or less value, but which, so far as they themselves are concerned, cannot be said to have commercial value. That is to say, they could not sell them outright to a manufacturer, nor could they successfully market the device. The chances are that if they tried to market their own invention, they would lose money, rather than make it. I tell you this from a very intimate knowledge of the conditions. Nine times out of ten, if you cannot sell your device outright to a manufacturer, you cannot not do anything with it at all. That is a fact, as those who will experiment will discover. There are, of course, occasional exceptions, but not very many.

A MISTAKE.—Langdon, N. Dak., relates an experience he has had with carbon soaking, using the formula suggested by Forth Worth, Tex., April 22nd issue. The formula contained bichromate of soda and sulphuric acid. He goes on to say that the experiment was not at all successful, and then tells me that his current was D. C. Now if Langdon had followed the matter closely, he would have seen that these carbon soaking stunts were designed entirely for use with alternating current. Therefore he was in error in applying it to D. C. He continues: "In the same issue, Milwaukee, Wis., informs us that a cure for a ghost is to place the condensers close together. I had no ghost, but I wanted more light. Took the condenser tube out, removed the spacing ring, replaced it with a narrow one, and put another narrow one behind the back condenser, the two rings, together equaling the old one in width. The inner ring is of such width as brings the lenses ⅛ of an inch apart, where they had been about ⅞. There was a very considerable increase in the light on the screen and no ghost. I presume the explanation is that the rays near the edge of the back condenser, diverging as they do, do not get to the front condenser, hence are lost. My back lens is a blueish tinge. Is this caused by heat, or is it the original condition? Is it better or worse than the clear white glass? I have broken only one lens in three years, and that was when I ran amperage to 50 for a test. Do condensers deteriorate?"

There unquestionably is some loss of light through the lenses being spaced too far apart, though I would not suppose this would be sufficient to amount to very much. I should imagine the amount of loss through this cause would depend considerably upon the focal length of the rear lens, being greater with one of short focus. The blue tint in your glass is something I have not seen, although a pink or purple tint is quite common. The discoloration is due to an excess of some ingredient used in making the glass. This blue tint has me interested. The wash lady puts blue in the water to make the clothes white. The painterman puts blue in his white paint to make it still more white. Now I wonder if that blue tint, while it unquestionably will absorb some light, would have the same effect on the light that the blue has on paint or clothes. I would like to have you do a little experimenting with other lenses, Langdon, and tell us what the result is as between that blue lens and the white lens. No, a lens does not deteriorate, unless it discolors or its surface gets rough. However, I think you will find that if you examine the surface of a lens which has been used for an extended period, and examine the surface of a new lens, using a microscope, you will find the surface of the old lens to be, by comparison, in very bad condition; therefore, if this is true, it must be said, after all, that a lens deteriorates.

INTERESTING LETTER.—Tex. (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I have been following the different experiments on the salt brine soaking of carbons with a good deal of interest, and have been doing some experimenting of my own. I have proven to my satisfaction that your original supposition, that 'there is something in it,' is quite correct. I find the following among the good results: I can get a steadier, and apparently brighter and, to a certainty, softer white light than with untreated carbons. I am unable to do this on any except the third position, or 60 amp. contact of the compensarc; but neither was I able to with untreated carbons, my picture being 10 x 14 at 75 feet. Carbons are not consumed so fast, frequently running six reels on one setting of carbons. Carbons burn more evenly and have no trouble maintaining crater. There is less noise in lamp house, the light burning with a nice little sing to it that is quite a relief after the noise I have been accustomed to. Don't know what effect it has on the juice bill, as we are on flat rate. Generally speaking I think it is the best thing I ever got onto for handling A. C. without a rectifier. I proceeded a little differently in preparing carbons than any account I have seen yet. I will therefore tell just how I did it, so that anyone who wishes can do as I did. I made the brine as directed, so that it would float a fresh egg about one-third above the surface of the liquid. This requires about three pounds of rock salt and enough distilled water to make a gallon. I broke the carbons in pieces about six inches long. I let them soak four days, and then took them home and put them on top of the cook stove, when there was a good hot fire, and left them there about an hour, by which time they were thoroughly dry. Scrape off the salt, which works out on the sides and ends, and they are ready for use. Takes a little while longer for carbons treated to get hot enough to make a good light, but when they get to going good the light is there to stay as long as there is enough left to reach up to the center of the condenser. I used Electra cored carbons, current 110 volt 60 cycle A. C., through a Ft. Wayne compensarc. I noticed that some had trouble getting good contact on account of salt crust. I remedied that trouble by getting three ten-gauge brass shot-gun shells, cutting off the breech and cutting out enough of the circumference to make them just a little larger than the carbon, so that by squeezing them a little they will slip on the carbons and stay where you put them. Every time I put in a fresh carbon I put on a fresh shell and afterward clean them all up at my leisure. I forgot to say that up to now I have used the treated carbons underneath only. Later I am going to try them both top and bottom. Now I have a theory of my own, to account for the effect these carbons have on the light, and I think it is correct, or at least is correct according to my knowledge of chemistry, which same has been a part of my means of a livelihood up till the time I got into the picture show game. It is this. It is a well-known fact that when any salt of sodium (salt is sodium chloride) is placed on a platinum wire and held in a colorless flame, such as gas or alcohol, it imparts to that flame a brilliant yellow color. Now the same thing would happen in the arc, only the whiteness of the arc is so intense that the small amount of sodium present only serves to modify the whiteness, instead of turning it yellow. I have no doubt that the man who said he was the American agent for several brands of imported carbons, and who has written to Berlin, realizes this fact, and after his chemist has determined the exact amount of salt required to produce the best results, we will be able to buy carbons already prepared. Now I have written you a long letter to tell just a few things that I had found out. I feel so good over it that I just kept on talking, without regard to space. Publish as much or little of this in the Dep't as you desire, but please omit name and town. I am not seeking publicity, but only desire to have others profit by anything I may have run onto that they did not."

Now I wish all you fellows were not so modest. It is much more interesting to be able to give the location of the writer, and I don't think the publication of the name of the town would hurt any of the brothers. I can fully realize that, under some conditions, a man might send in matter to which he would not want his name appended. I can even conceive that letters sometimes come which ought by all means be published, yet the publication of which, if the name of the writer were included, would do him much damage. But with letters like this, surely there is no reason for such bashfulness. Another writer this week remarked that he "did not want to butt in"; now, friends, let me inform you that you are not "butting in" when you write to this department. That is exactly what this department is for—discussion; and unless it brings out discussion it fails of its purpose. Therefore let no man think he is "butting in" when he writes to the editor of the projection department. Of course, I will suppress the name and town if desired, but unless there is some good reason for the request, I would esteem it a favor if you would allow me to publish at least the name of the town and, if possible, the name of the writer also. As to the experiments you have made, they are of interest, and I pass them on to our readers for consideration, though I cannot quite catch the idea of those shotgun shells. Suppose you make that a little more clear.

BOSTON ADOPTS AMENDMENTS.—We are in receipt, from the office of the Chief of the District Police, Boston, Mass., of a copy of certain amendments to the laws and regulations relative to moving pictures, which have just been adopted. The only change is, so far as we can see, that motor-driven machines are now, under certain conditions, permitted in Massachusetts. Section 19 of the law, as amended, reads: "Electric motors may be used for operating only on such machines as are especially fitted and approved for such use in accordance with the following requirements: (a) The motor must be securely attached to machine support; be satisfactorily enclosed, and must be separately fused and placed below the bottom line of lamp house. (b) Electric current to operate both arc light and motor must be controlled by one switch; an additional switch to control current to motor must be installed, and be so constructed as to spring open when not held closed by the operator. (c) Both switches and the starting box must be placed on the operating side of the machine, and at least one foot back from a perpendicular line of film exposure. (d) All electrical devices must be securely mounted on incombustible supports, and be closed satisfactorily to the inspector. (e) The machine must be so constructed, or protected, that, while in operation, displaying a picture, the film cannot escape from the head enclosure or elsewhere, except as the same is taken up by the lower magazine, and crank must be removed when machine is motor-driven. (f) No person will be permitted to operate a motor-driven machine until he has received a special license therefor, which license will authorize the holder to operate either a motor or hand-driven machine.

I am unable to understand the reason for compelling the location of the motor below the lamp house, though I know of no particular objection to it. Clause b of rule 19 says that the electric current to operate both arc lamp and the motor must be controlled by one switch. Now if somebody will explain to me why this should be, I would be only too pleased to give ear. While I do not know that the scheme is particularly objectionable, it looks to me very much like a waste of good ink. The spring switch in motor circuit is not a bad scheme, but the location of this switch should have been more definitely established. It should be such as will require the operator to remain in operating position beside the machine. It may be claimed that clause c covers this, but it does nothing of the kind, since clause c would be complied with if the switch were on the wall, on the operating side of the machine, but ten feet away from it. The scheme for allowing only those who hold a special license therefor to operate a motor-driven machine is one which may be made productive of much good. If the District Police will only license men to operate motor-driven machines who have established a reputation for careful, painstaking work, then clause f will be of real value. The danger of the motor-driven machine does not come through lack of knowledge of the operator as to motors. It comes wholly and entirely through the carelessness of the operator in not remaining beside his machine, where he belongs every moment of the time it is running. The spring switch is, I presume, a scheme to accomplish that very thing—that is, to compel the operator to remain in operating position. The spring switch, however, is not the best means of doing this; it is altogether too easy to beat that kind of a game. As a whole, however, the amendments to the law are, by comparison, very good, and this we presume is due, at least to some extent, to the fact that the Boston authorities submitted the amendments to machine manufacturers before finally passing them. As soon as possible it is my intention to comment at some length on the Massachusetts laws and regulations relating to moving pictures, which, taken as a whole, are perhaps as good a set of rules and laws as we have seen, though they contain several rather foolish and some distinctly bad provisions.

BRIGHT LIGHT.—Toronto, Canada, writes: "We have a local here in Toronto, No. 173, organized over two years, and getting stronger all the time. As to the brother who said he never saw a clear field projected with A. C. current, I will say that I have seen just as clear a screen with A. C. as with D. C., but, of course, this can only be done by the use of much higher amperage. I am working with 25-cycle (Don't you feel sorry for me?), and get a very bright light with 65 amperes at 50 feet, using an economizer. The flicker, however, is very bad indeed."

Yes, I feel sorry for you on that 25-cycle stunt. I should suppose that managers would install a motor generator when the supply is 25-cycle, as it is not fit for projection work. The brother orders a hand-book, and we trust he will find it entirely satisfactory. Glad to hear of the success of Local 173. May it continue.

DIM LIGHT.— Fort Plain, N. Y., writes: "Am having considerable trouble with my light, not being able to make it bright enough. It shows up brown on the screen. Have used different condensing lens combinations, and now have two 6½ lenses in. The projection lens is 3½ E. F. Use 50 amperes of 110 volt, 60-cycle, through a Powers inductor. Have a Powers Six machine. Size of the picture is 24½ x 23½; throw 89 feet. Have cleaned terminals and lamp. Please advise."

In the first place, Fort Plain, your picture is not 24½ x 23½ feet. If it is 24½ feet wide, it would be a little more than 18 feet high. However, if you are projecting a 24½-foot picture, you need not expect to get good curtain illumination with less than 80 amperes of A. C.; 45 amperes of D. C. would give you fair illumination, though nothing extra, but 50 amperes of A. C. would show up very poorly when spread around over more than almost 450 square feet of surface. There are only two things you can do, viz: Reduce the size of your picture, or very largely increase your amperage. In the latter case, you must increase the size of your wires, use larger carbons and get a lamp heavy enough to stand that kind of strenuous service.

AN ADDRESS.—"Some time ago I wrote asking for information as to where to get "Good-Night and film announcements." You answered me and I lost the address. Would you kindly send me the address again, or publish it in the department?"

Neighbor, I cannot undertake to carry a lot of addresses in the top of my head. What few brains I have got are worked fully up to capacity without using them for a store house for that kind of truck. As I remember the thing, considerable trouble was taken to hunt up those addresses for you, and it seems you did not think enough of them to take care of them when supplied to you; all of which is not very satisfactory. We are glad to supply information, even though it takes considerable labor to dig it up, but we must ask you to do your part by taking care of it after it is supplied. The desired addresses are Cine Film Co., 145 West 45th Street, New York; Crystal Film Co., Wendover and Park Avenues, New York; Carlton Motion Picture Laboratories, 20th and Neptune Avenue, Coney Island, New York. Each of these firms make film titles and announcements to order.

PROJECTION MACHINES.—Denver, Col., writes, asking the names of the different projection machines in use in this country. Also wants to know if any American machines are used in the old countries.

Names of the machines are: Edison, Powers, Motiograph, Standard, Simplex, Edengraph, Selig, Viascope, Pathe, Lubin and Dressler. Very few of the Dressler, Selig and Viascope machines are in use, and the Lubin is confined practically to the eastern territory. To what extent the Motiograph has been sent abroad I do not know, though I understand a great many of them have crossed the pond. The Powers people have also exported a large number of machines to various parts of Europe, and some to South America.

LIGHT TROUBLE.—Iowa Falls, Iowa, writes: "At present I am in deep trouble with my light. I just installed a new Hallberg Economy Coil and find I am not getting proper results from same. Have carefully followed direction in setting up the coil, and have used two different makes of cored carbons, but neither proved satisfactory. In the first place the coil makes a loud humming sound. In the second place the arc is unsteady, and gives off a large flame. This flame does not center as it should, but circles around the carbons. Am using a Pathe machine. Any assistance you can render in locating the trouble will certainly be appreciated."

First: By "Economy Coil," I presume you mean Mr. Hallberg's Economizer. Second: If you have it located near any sheet iron, move it away and the noise will probably cease, or at least be decreased. A transformer (the Economizer is nothing more or less than a low voltage transformer) will often set up vibration in sheet metal if it is close to the same. Third: have the local powerhouse men test your amperage with an ammeter, hitching same between the Economizer and lamp—not between Economizer and line. I am of the opinion that you are pulling too much amperage. Possibly your voltage is 120 or 125 and you have a 110 volt economizer hitched up on its highest delivery contact. This would have the effect of overloading the economizer. It might cause the noise and would account for the flame and action of the arc. Until you have done the things suggested and made report thereon I cannot offer intelligent advice. Look at plate on economizer and be sure it corresponds to voltage and cycle of your current.

BACK TO PICTURES.

The Broad Street Theater, of Trenton, N. J., which was under the management of Messrs. Perry, Brassel and Currie, whose policy it was to give purely vaudeville entertainments, has been turned over to the owners, Messrs. Harry Havenson and Michael Galinsky, for the simple reason that vaudeville produced very poor box-office receipts. The owners will reopen the house, giving an entertainment of five new and up-to-date reels of motion pictures.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE LAUREL-WREATH OF FAME" (Essanay).

Among the fine films released by the Essanay Company for the week beginning May 27th is "The Laurel-Wreath of Fame," a beautiful and impressive drama depicting the life-tragedy of one of the world's greatest musicians. The subject is booked for Friday, May 31st, and tells the story of Guido Marcello, a young composer, who is infatuated with Maria Medici, a pretty singer. She sings his first composition, and Guido, overcome with her beauty, pleads with her to marry him. Preferring her musical education to matrimony, Maria refuses him. Later the death of his mother leaves Guido alone in the world and striving for recognition. Years pass and he is poverty-stricken and still searching for fame. An accidental meeting with Maria, who is now a famous prima donna, causes her to sing one of his compositions at her concert that night and Guido is immediately recognized as a genius. But upon going to his garret, Maria and her friends find him delirious from starvation and want, and he dies with the brief knowledge that fame has come too late.

Scene from "The Laurel Wreath of Fame" (Essanay).

The Essanay Company have made the most of the striking subject afforded and the production is excellent. Francis X. Bushman plays Guido with keen perception of characterization and a depth of feeling that makes the study one of the finest this popular actor has yet given his admirers. Dolores Cassinelli moulds beauty of face and form into the role of Maria, and her numerous tense scenes are ideally portrayed.

From a productive standpoint the film is striking. The scenes are carefully managed and the settings unusually attractive. The climax where Guido raves in delirium before the startled fashionable concert critics, and the lamentable death of the composer just as fame places the laurel-wreath upon his brow, is exquisitely portrayed and wonderfully developed.

The photography throughout is striking in clear, clean-cut excellence, and the tonal values are beautiful in their perfect timing.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S BIBLE" (Essanay).

The famous character-creation of "Broncho Billy," originated by Mr. G. M. Anderson, director and star of the Essanay Western Stock Company, is too well known throughout two hemispheres to need further introduction here, and the above mentioned production is one of the finest of this splendid series.

After robbing a stagecoach, Broncho and his pal divide the loot and part. Among his portion Broncho finds a well-worn Bible, laughingly puts it inside his shirt and rides into town where he sits in a poker game, detects "Quick-Draw" Kelly, a wily sharper, in the cat of slipping aces from his boot-top, brands him with disgrace and drives him from the place. Burning for revenge, Kelly tries to shoot Broncho through the open door, but his life is saved when the Bible stops the bullet. Picking the lead from the pages, Broncho pursues Kelly into the foothills, traps him on the verge of a precipice and a terrific hand-to-hand struggle ensues. Broncho overcomes the ruffian and is about to cast him to his death when the Bible falls from his pocket and the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," causes him to spare Kelly's worthless life, set him free, then commence to ponder seriously on the Word of God. The following Sunday finds him in church for the first time in his life, and we realize that complete reformation has made a man of him.

Scene from "Broncho Billy's" Bible (Essanay).

Mr. Anderson, as usual, is splendid as Broncho. His conception and portrayal of Western types is at all times perfect and stamps him as a master pantomimist.

Unusually beautiful natural scenery abounds throughout the film, and the scenes in the foothills are particularly fine. The struggle on the edge of the precipice is sensational and highly thrilling, the audience viewing the characters from far down the canyon, with the plains stretching away to the dim and smoky hills.

The photography of all Essanay Western subjects, taken under the natural sunlight, is well-nigh perfect, and this film is especially attractive in beautiful tonal values. It is booked for release June 1st.

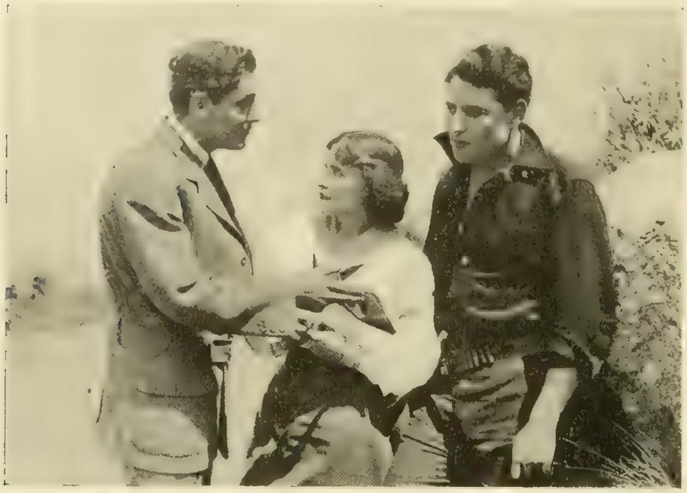
NEW ANNOUNCEMENT SLIDES.

The new announcement slides now being manufactured and advertised by Scott & Van Altena are exquisite in every way. Each title is ingeniously illustrated by pictures taken from life and beautifully colored. The whole scheme is entirely new and distinctive, setting a new standard for this class of slides. The workmanship, too, is right up to the high standard maintained by this well-known slide house. For instance, "Welcome" is protrayed by a little white kitten patiently waiting a bird which is about to fly down to it from the top of the frame which holds the picture of the waiting kitten. Another, "Good Night," shows a little boy with his trim "nightie" on seated on the rim of an old fashioned candlestick and holder, rubbing his sleepy eyes. The candle being lighted and so on through the whole list.

They have given to the Chicago Song Slide Agency of sixth floor Powers Building, Chicago, Ill., the agency for the following states: Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana. We predict a large sale for these "Announcement Slides de Luxe." Their catalogue is neatly gotten up and contains eleven of the pictures as examples.

"THE REWARD OF VALOR" (American).

The aristocratic Ward family, including Father Ward, Mother Ward, pretty sister Marguerite and Brother Bill, came for a short stay on their Western ranch. Charley Hicox, ranch foreman, met brother Bill and Bill liked him. He boasted loudly to Marguerite of his new-found friend, so when Marguerite met Charley it was pretty nearly love at first sight. Charley called several times on Marguerite, much to Bill's delight, when, one day, the father in an ugly mood ordered him from the premises. This was shortly after the arrival of the Earl of Wight, beautifully attired, insignificant in the Western atmosphere, but possessing the good wishes of Father and Mother Ward. Marguerite didn't like him at all, but the parents were determined to add nobility to aristocracy.



Scene from "The Reward of Valor" (American).

Then Bill had an idea. He confided it to Charley, who promptly enthused over it, and the result was a casual stroll into the woolly section of the ranch, where Father and Bill were suddenly held up by bandits. Charley rushed to the rescue and the chicken-hearted bandits made haste to leave. There was excitement on the ranch when Father, hatless and warm, rushed in for assistance. The Earl refused to go farther than the bunk house. Father thought of brother Bill in the clutches of those terrible marauders and clamored for help. Again Charley hurried to the rescue, receiving the congratulations of the entire family, including the mischievous Bill and the charming Marguerite. You could easily guess that Father Ward felt no further fancy for the Earl of Wight. Incidentally he made no further objections to Charley visiting on the front doorstep.

"A CAVE MAN WOOING" (Imp).

In these days of sameness of plot it is refreshing to hit upon a theme in a picture which is not hackneyed or done to death. It would be difficult to classify this story. It is not a drama; it is not a comedy; it defies classification. Perhaps it will be best described as a whimsicality.

A young fellow in love with a girl makes little progress in her affections. He is good looking, prosperous, presentable. But he stands no chance of winning her affections in competition with a friend, who displays the prowess of a young giant. The way to the girl's heart is by the Marathon route.

But our hero, if we may so call him, finds a way to the goal he covets. He imbibes the idea from the cheap newspapers that women reverence physical strength. So he for Prof. S. Trong's Physical Culture School. Whence after three months' nightly practise he emerges a strong man, having in the meanwhile downed his professor and demonstrated his right to the title of king of the school.

Thus strengthened he makes renewed play for the heart of the girl. He does not get her heart; but he gets the girl herself. He shows that he can lift the family piano, as it were, by a touch of his finger; his strength, indeed, is marvelous in many respects.

He goes the limit by forcibly bearing the girl away and forcibly marrying her. But at the height of his conquest, he is pursued by the girl's friends.

Does she give up her young giant of a husband? No! Her former lover and her relatives are turned down and she succumbs to the lure of her captor husband.

This theme is worked out with irresistible conviction by the Imp Company's New York forces. King Baggot is the "sissy" hero, who becomes a strong man. To see Baggot and W. R. Daly, as Prof. S. Trong, handle the gloves is a treat.

At the beginning of things Daly easily defeats his pupil, but after a little spell of practise, Baggot becomes cock of the walk.

In the rest of the play, Mr. Baggot carries the whole story on his own broad shoulders and when he carries off the heroine, played by Miss Violet Horner, he scores a remarkable acting success.

This full reel comedy is entertaining from start to finish. It is claimed to be the most mirthful and original comedy presented for a long time by the Imp, and will be out May 20th.

"THE MAID'S STRATAGEM" (Imp).

High life below stairs is shown in this film. We see the servants of a great house enjoying themselves while the mistress goes off to a big reception, or she is supposed to go. She does not and cannot.

So a maid goes instead of her. She borrows her mistress's clothing; has a great time at the reception and is clever enough to ensnare a lover with plenty of money.

Scene from "The Maid's Stratagem" (Imp).

So what does she care when the mistress on discovering the impersonation raises particular Cain. She has got a husband by her stratagem. Good for her.

There is all the snap and vim in the world in this pretty little comedy, played bv Vivian Prescot, as the maid, and H. S. Mack, as the wealthy lover. May 25th is the date of release.

"FOR THE GOOD OF HER MEN" A STRONG SUBJECT.

"For the Good Of Her Men" is the title of a coming release of the American Film Mfg. Company, scheduled for Monday, June 10. It is a masterful portrayal of an heroic subject—Mother Love, a theme whose appeal never lags and which never fails to stir a jaded pulse. In this subject the mother with her husband, two boys and two daughters, are guilty of running an illicit still in the forest. When one of the daughters has an excellent opportunity to marry the chance is almost spoiled by the dread of discovery. The mother grieves in secret—sees her two boys slowly becoming addicted to their own poisonous brew and the father more indifferent to the unlawful features of his business. Then comes the supreme test of mother love. She reports the illicit brewery to the U. S. Marshal in the hope of saving her boys from the drunkard's end and ultimately saving the father. The picture is more than well acted, teaches a really great lesson and combines all those fine points of story-telling that go to make a memorable film.

CHANGE OF TITLE OF LUBIN FILM.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company has notified the Moving Picture World that the picture heretofore announced to be released under the title of "Her Music Master" will be released under a new title, "A Husband's Awakening." A brief description of this picture was given in the issue of May 18th under the old title, "Her Music Master." Our readers will please take notice of the change.

"THE POWER OF MELODY" (Nestor).

A very interesting story, with real pathos, is "The Power of Melody," which is to be released by the Nestor Company on Monday, May 20th. Much time and thought has been spent on the staging of this picture and the result is most excellent, for the picture is undoubtedly one of the best that the Nestor people have produced. Arthur Von Meter as the struggling composer and Vivian Rich as the wayward girl, accomplish the most difficult work in the picture and Eugenia Forde, although only portraying a minor part, the wife of the violinist, is worthy of mention.

Scene from "The Power of Melody" (Nestor).

We see the scantily furnished home of the composer, where he has just completed his song, and in a few moments he is hastening to the publishers with his composition. Despair awaits him, however, for the publisher rejects his piece without allowing the violinist to play it. The poor composer, on returning to his home, scans the newspaper in search of a position and seeing an advertisement for a violinist in a cafe, hastens to the place and secures the position.

A most beautiful and realistic scene shows the interior of the cafe. The violinist has just started to play his latest composition when the publisher's daughter, Georgia, with three of her companions, enters the cafe. While everyone is making merry around her, we see the effect the plaintive melody has on the erring girl. Thoughts awaken within her of her sorrowing parents and sobs shake her frame. The violinist, realizing that it was his song that had the power to soften the girl's heart, hastens to her side and offers to take her to her home.

His magic fingers playing the sweet strain, the violinist stands on the porch of the publisher's home with Georgia, while the old couple listen in wonder to the wonderful melody which fills their hearts with love and sorrow for their erring daughter, and when Georgia enters the room, she is taken to their hearts again, while the composer is happy in the thought that it lay in the power of his music to move hardened hearts.

GEORGE NICHOLLS WITH BISON.

George O. Nicholls, director with the Thanhouser Company, has resigned from that concern to affiliate in the same capacity with the Bison Company. Before coming to Thanhouser Company Mr. Nicholls was long connected with the Biograph.

SOLAX BURNS AUTO FOR REALISTIC EFFECT.

It is not customary for picture makers to burn valuable automobiles for the purpose of giving a touch of realism to a picture, but that is what the Solax Company did to get the right effect in a forthcoming picture entitled "Mickey's Pal." Speaking of this incident in the picture Madame Blache expressed herself in the following terms:

"While it is not an ordinary thing to wantonly destroy an expensive automobile, still if the Solax Company believes that the plot or thread of a moving picture demands anything of the kind the matter of expense never stands in the way. The car that we used, to be sure, was a Duracq, three years old, and its engine was pretty well out of commission. It was not beyond repair, however, and was far from being a candidate for the junk heap.

Burning the Solax Auto.

"The picture in which the car was destroyed was entitled 'Mickey's Pal' and it tells a storv of two crooks, one of whom reforms. Mickey, the one who reforms, is engaged as watchman on the grounds of a large estate. In the part of the picture where the machine is burned Mickey's employer has returned from the opera and his car is standing outside the mansion. At this point the chauffeur asks Mickey to watch the automobile while he goes to get a drink, and while he is gone Mickey sees his old pal sneaking through a rear door of his employer's house with swag.

"Mickey leaves the automobile and runs after his erstwhile pal. The man stops and puts up a fight and in the scrimmage both men manage to get back to where the automobile is standing. Mickey has had his pipe in his mouth during the tussle. The pipe accidentally lands into the car, and being lighted, sets fire to the gasoline tank.

"We secured three separate pictures of the explosion. One we will use in the motion picture; another will be used in the 'Animated Weekly,' published by the Sales Company, and still another we have in reserve. There are a number of very interesting complications in the story, all of which make it a picture of great strength."

The picture was put on the stage under the supervision of Edward Warren, director of the company. It is said to be one of the strongest pictures ever used in films. Three separate cameras were focused on the fire. The principal roles in the picture were filled by Darwin Karr and Lee Beggs, the leading men of the Solax Stock Company.

EIGHT-SHEETS, TOO, FOR "JESS."

Thanhouser Company have supplemented their publicity paraphernalia for "Jess" with eight-sheets. Paper of this size is quite unusual for a regular release, but the New Rochelle offices report a good demand for it. The "eights" show scenes in the Boer War, which figures prominently in the Rider Haggard story. The rest of the "Jess" publishing stuff consists of two varieties of one-sheets, illustrated heralds and three-sheets.

Subscribers: Kindly renew your subscriptions promptly. This will save us considerable work and give us more time to make a better paper, if that is possible. If your subscription to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has expired, send in your renewal today. Co-operation spells your success and ours. Domestic, $3.00. Canada, $3.50. Foreign, $4.00.

The Smuggler's Dogs.

A Difficult Picture by the Lux Co., with Canine Actors in the Leading Roles.

A CLEVER and well executed example of dog training in a moving picture always gives it a double interest. In such a film the story is really secondary to the work of the animal. The work of making such a picture is extremely tedious, and requires an infinite amount of patience, to say nothing of the hundreds of feet of wasted film in retakes of almost every scene. When a number of dogs are introduced into a picture the difficulties are multiplied, and with a pack of dogs the task becomes a hard one indeed.

In "The Smugglers' Dogs," the Lux Company has made a picture that is more than interesting; it is remarkable to say the least. It is quite certain that some one worked very hard to produce the picture, and that person whoever he is, deserves great credit for turning out such a good result. Smugglers' dogs are dogs trained by smugglers to carry contraband merchandise across the frontier. Such things have been done in Europe scores of times. The dogs, by their fleetness, evade revenue officers both on foot and mounted, and make their way to certain rendezvous, from which they have previously been led.

Scene from "The Smugglers' Dogs" (Lux).

The story of "The Smugglers' Dogs" gives us an extremely queer idea of the way dogs are used in smuggling. It also gives an idea of the work of police dogs, which are used in Europe along the frontiers for the particular purpose of running down smugglers' dogs.

In this story, one of the smugglers had formed an acquaintance with the daughter of a revenue officer, which later developed into a love affair. The girl foolishly listened to the man's love tales and promises. She finally consented to elope with the smuggler, and left her father's home one night to go with him. Meanwhile, the smuggling had been carried on uninterruptedly and was at its height on the night of the elopement. There were many dogs in the woods running to and fro, some of them smugglers' dogs and some of them police dogs. It was while groping about in the dark woods that the flight of the girl was discovered by her father, who came upon the pair while searching for smugglers. They were close to the smugglers den. A call brought the law-breakers together and a battle was on. A fierce fight took place in which shots were exchanged, one of them striking the officer's daughter, causing her death.

The dogs appear all through the story, and they do the bulk of the work. The love story is incidental to the work of the dogs. The display of canine intelligence in the picture is something that will be remembered for a long time to come. The situations are not forced, and every appearance of the dogs has a logical bearing on the final ending. Regardless of what patient work may have been involved, the screen results show a number of canines that seem invested with human intelligence. It is a picture that will please any kind of people at any part of the earth. Though the picture is not quite a full thousand feet, it is one of the best that Lux has ever put out.

On the same reel is a short comedy called, "Arabella's Flight." This is a strenuous comedy illustrating some of the perils of too much hot air. H. F. H.

WHAT AVAILS THE CROWN (Rex).

That royalty in its younger years is altogether human, the whole world likes to believe. But as royalty ages the accepted idea is that the element of humanity disappears from royal hearts. Being of royal name itself, Rex should understand royal matters. To show that they do understand them, this picture has been made. Aside from its principal charm, Miss Marion Leonard, the picture, reflects a pathos which must enter into the life of every Princess of high rank.

The Princess in this picture was a real red-blooded girl. The blue blood of her ancestors had not yet begun to congeal in her veins and heart, to drive out the warmth of sympathetic existence. The first cloud in her happy life came upon the day when her betrothal to a foreign nobleman was announced. At first she rebelled, but she was like a bird that beats its wings against the bars of a cage. After fluttering feebly for a time, she accepted the inevitable in a perfunctory way, but with a vague hope or yearning in her breast that it might be only an unpleasant dream, and that all would come right in the end.

In a fit of determination she ran away one day to the home of her old nurse. She wanted to be away from courts and royalty, and live the life of an ordinary human being. The old nurse guarded her secret and the Princess lived among her people and was happy. She managed to forget that she was betrothed to a foreign prince whom she did not love. While living the life of a villager she fell in love with a handsome violinist who was quite poor. It was a case of true love on both sides, and their love transcended all other conditions. The Princess was satisfied to remain a villager and marry the violinist, which she no doubt would have done had not the King, her father, died as a result of her runaway episode.

Scene from "What Avails the Crown" (Rex).

The minions of the King found the Princess at the home of her nurse, proclaimed her as Queen and urged her to return to the palace and occupy the throne. This she was loath to do as it involved a separation with her lover. When the first impulse was over, the light of cold reason pointed out to the Princess that it was her duty to return to the throne and reign as Queen, becoming the wife of the Prince whom her father had selected as her consort, not for her happiness, but a sacrifice for the benefit of her subjects.

The story has a pathetic interest that will awaken a response in every feminine heart, and, it may as well be said, in the masculine heart. The acting of Miss Leonard has much to do with making the film a charming piece of work, although the story itself is strong and probable. H. F. H.

ECLAIR WILL PRODUCE A BIBLICAL FEATURE.

"The Holy City," that grand, old American hymn, has been taken as a theme for a two-reel classic production and a large special company is working on an allegorical interpretation of the inspiring song, which is known throughout the length and breadth of the country. The clergy has already shown a deep interest in the production, and here will be another forward step in the ascending influence of the motion-picture art on public morals and art. The work is under the direction of Mr. Arnaud, who was the producer of the sensational poetic success; the two-reel "Poe's Raven."

ST. LOUIS MUSICIANS ON STRIKE.

A deadlock now existing here between the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association and the St. Louis Theater Managers' Association, which comprises ninety per cent. of the owners of the moving picture houses of St. Louis, promises to develop into a long drawn out war and one that will evidently cost a pretty penny before it is over.

The strike originated over a demand on the part of the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association for an increase of 33 1/3 per cent. in wages. and the privilege of classifying the different theaters, and the authority to determine the number of musicians each house should employ.

The moving picture houses resisted the demand and moving picture men in general are up in arms over the demands of the union, which they say are not only unreasonable, but presumptuous inasmuch as they question the right of the union to dictate to them how many men or women they shall employ.

Picture men claim the number of houses in St. Louis in the past two years has decreased from an odd three hundred houses to a little over one hundred and seventy in that short space of time due to "wildcat" city regulations and ordinances which have been fostered by politicians and others, who think that the picture people are making a mint of money and should be forced to "cough up" on every available pretext that can be thought out in order to harass the industry.

They cite the fact that nowhere in any business is there any better pay than is now enjoyed by piano players, leaders. drummers, cornet players and so on than is the case in the moving picture houses in the country to-day.

Figuring three hours work of an evening and the Sunday time, musicians, a great many of whom find daily employment which does not interfere in the least with their picture work, draw on an average of from $16.25 a week to $19.25 a week.

Under the ultimatum as issued by the union any playhouse seating over 500 people must pay a piano player $45 a week and an increase of 33 1/3 per cent. for cornet players, drummers, etc.

That this demand cannot be met by the smaller houses is admitted, and in the cases of the larger picture houses would make an inroad upon their revenues, which is considered unjust.

A deeper motive is conceded by those on the inside and it has been expressed very freely that the Theatrical Syndicate is aiming a blow at the industry through the mask of the musicians union.

It is recalled that at the time of the agitation at Washington last fall when the subject of "Copyrights on Scenarios" was before the house the long arm of the Theatrical Trust was very much in evidence.

Moving picture men here have had to contend all winter with petty annoyances from the "powers that be." Whether it was in the shape of threatened regulations concerning the blockading of streets by people lining up in turn to get into the showhouses or innuendoes restricting the housing of manufacturers or distributors of films to one or two-story buildings. That there is a concerted movement on foot against the picture show business is admitted, and the time has come for the picture people to get together for protection is at hand.

That the demands of the union will be rigorously resisted goes without saying and the final outcome is being watched with interest.

ALASKA-SIBERIA PICTURES OPEN IN FOUR PRINCIPAL CITIES.

Metropolitan bookings have been arranged for a summer showing of the Carnegie Museum Expedition in moving pictures. The pictures were shown privately to a number of theatrical magnates and representatives, including the Shuberts, Nixon & Zimmerman, Charles Frohman, William A. Brady and Stair & Havlin. After the exhibition there was no end of favorable comment for the pictures, and bookings were quickly completed for their exhibition in four of the largest cities at leading theaters controlled by the gentlemen named above.

Scene from the Alaska-Siberian Pictures.

The New York exhibition was booked to begin at Maxine Elliott's Theater on Monday, May 20, to continue all summer. Another exhibition will begin in Chicago on May 27 at the Powers Theater. At Philadelphia a third exhibition will be inaugurated at the Garrick Theater, beginning Monday, May 20. Pittsburg will be the fourth city in the list with probably more to follow. These engagements are indefinite and will continue all summer at each house where no previous bookings interfere.

In New York the pictures will be lectured by Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt, who took the pictures. In the other cities, lecturers will be provided who are familiar with Alaskan life. There are six reels to this set of views, which, with a preliminary talk on Alaska, will make a full evening's entertainment. After the large theater engagements are filled there will probably be some arrangement made for splitting the reels into two parts so that smaller houses giving shorter shows will be able to use them. Exhibitors from towns adjacent to New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Pittsburg are advised to visit the exhibition of the Alaska-Siberia pictures nearest at hand, as it may be profitable to secure first booking for them.

LARGEST SOLID SCREEN.

What is perhaps the largest moving picture screen with a solid surface that goes up into the flies that has ever been used in the history of the moving picture business was installed last week by the Perfection Concave Screen people at the 14th Street Theater, West 14th Street, near 6th Avenue, New York City, under he management of J. Wesley Rosenquest.

The screen is made of wood fiber covering a wooden frame built to resemble a huge spider web. It has a surface of 396 square feet, upon which a 17½ by 21½ foot picture is shown. The curtain weighs in the neighborhood of 500 pounds, and is taken up into the flies by means of steel cables in the same manner as the other "drops." Mr. Rosenquest expressed himself as highly satisfied with his new curtain.

THE BEAUTY SPOTS (Eclair).

Young men, with rich fathers, and dudish appearance, are seldom apt to succeed. But the American Eclair studio has proved that it is possible despite all previous performances, in the "Beauty Spots." This is the story of a romantic youth with more family tree than business gumption, who finally makes a fortune by popularizing those weird courtplaster decorations known as "beauty spots." This particular Archie manages to embroil his prospective father-in-law in a number of choice experiences, which not only result in his own particular fortune, but in his winning of the hand of the rich man's beautiful daughter. And to the auditor who has ever seen the class of youthful beauties who are made famous, and who make famous, Eclair productions, this ought to explain some pretty lively action.

Scene from "The Beauty Spot" (Eclair).

"THE CASHIER'S ORDEAL" (Champion.)

In "The Cashier's Ordeal" the Champion Company has produced a very interesting story which is quite out of the conventional, in that the real hero does not figure so prominently as a young man who, to say the least, is lucky. Jack Cummings is a cashier in a bank and loves the daughter of the president of the concern. Jack has flourished, but the president declines to give him his daughter, saying his pile is not large enough. In despair Jack decides to make a grand coup in a financial way. Bob McCoy is his chauffeur, but Bob falls into disgrace by sneaking out his employer's car and taking his sweetheart for a ride. For this he is discharged. Jack plans with the vice-president of the bank to use some of the funds of the institution in a speculation and is hopeful. He receives word that the investment has gone wrong and ruin is inevitable. He is alone and cannot face the apparent disgrace, so he decides to end his life. At this juncture Bob enters in the guise of a burglar and takes in the situation at a glance. Holding a revolver to the head of his late employer, he prevents him from carrying out his resolutions until the morning dawns, when Jack's sweetheart dashes in with a newspaper containing an account of the death of the vice-president, and his confession of crimes, of embezzlement and of peculation, exonerating Jack. The cashier is overjoyed, but his happiness is made more complete by the tidings that his investment, that had been reported to be worthless, was in reality a paying venture. As Jack owed all to Bob, the latter was forgiven and taken into service again, and the wedding that followed was a double one.

DANTE IN PHILADELPHIA.

Messrs. Collins and Collins, owners of the Pennsylvania State Rights for Dante's Inferno, opened for the season at the Chestnut Street Opera House, one of Philadelphia's largest theaters. The production of l'Inferno in the Quaker City has taken well. The management report playing to "sold out" houses since the opening date, at prices ranging from 25c to $1.00. On another page of this issue will be found Collins & Collins advertisement, which will enable exhibitors throughout Pennsylvania desirous of booking this film masterpiece an opportunity of communicating with the owners.

Simplex The Peer of All Moving Picture Machines

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY:

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theaters.
ARTHUR S. WHITE, Manager Moving Picture Department, Percy G. Williams Circuit of theaters.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
WM. J. GANE, Manhattan Theater.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theaters. WALTER ROSENBERG, Savoy Theater.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
HARRY LEVINE, Manager, Riverside Theater.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. STERN, Proprietor, Bleecker Theater.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. CRANE, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.
W. D. KOLLE, Prospect Hall, Brooklyn.

It is the best we have ever used and we have ordered two more for our other theaters.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

THE Vaudette, Springfield, Ill., recently installed a three-piece orchestra.

James F. McCray has purchased the Ole Theater in Mt. Carroll, Ill., and will make features of pictures. The place will retain the old name.

The La Salle Enterprise Company of La Salle, Ill., has been incorporated with capital stock of $25,000, to operate a theater. The incorporators are I. Guthman, F. W. Koenig, and M. N. Goldsmith.

John Laffey, of the Savoy Theater, Delavan, Ill., is giving his patrons each Thursday night some feature picture, such as "Arrah-Na-Pogue" or "Cinderella." Delavan is a small city, where such nights should serve as the best sort of advertising.

Raymond Fortener has been in charge of the sound effects at the Majestic Theater, Freeport, Ill.

"The public has already expressed their approval of the change and would prefer to see a thousand dollar artist in good moving pictures than a five-dollar artist (?) on the stage," announces Earl Ward, new manager of the Medley Opera House at Flora, Ill. Of course he has cut out cheap vaudeville. A feature reel will be given once each week.

Sunday closing is bothering Janesville, Wis., where the theaters are open seven days a week for the first time.

The New Suburban Theater Company of Wellston, Mo., has been incorporated with capital stock of $10,000.

Ed. Fellis has opened a new theater in Schram City, a suburb of Hillsboro, Ill.

The Empress Theater Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with capital stock of $150,000 to operate a theater. The incorporators are Edward B. Healy, Frank H. Graham, and Wilbur C. Benton.

Joaquin Wilson, manager of the Star Theater, Clinton, Ill., was arrested April 14, for violating an ordinance governing the closing of amusement places on Sunday. Wilson made a test case of the matter, Judge Cochran of the Macon County Circuit Court, recently having discharged a Decatur theater owner. Dante's "Inferno" was the attraction at the Clinton House on the Sunday in question.

One of the aims of the newly organized "Christian Council" of Elgin, Ill., is to fight the Sunday theater.

The Airdome at Bunker Hill, Ill., has been enlarged.

William Ater has opened the Family Theater at Princeton, Ill. The new house has a capacity of 250. Creed Brawner is the singer of illustrated songs.

Rudolf Hoffman and Charles Runyan, of Havana, Ill., will give pictures over a circuit of small towns near that city.

Manager Miller, of the Airdome, at Litchfield, Ill., has increased the capacity of his house so that it seats 350 more persons.

It is much more pleasing now to attend a performance at the Lyric Theater, Springfield, Ill., than it was in the past. The three-piece orchestra adds to the general effect. It does not go far from the theme of the picture at any time and when frequently the music coincides with the motif of the scenario the patron feels grateful to Manager Harry Loper for the willingness to let one live with the pictures. His reiterated "We do not inflict the terrible song upon our patrons" has become well-nigh an advertising slogan.

N. Hatcher has opened a moving picture show at Elmwood, Ill.

John E. Clem has given up his lease on the Majestic Theater at Bushnell, Ill.

Spearman Lewis, historian of the St. Louis Business Men's League, recently exhibited moving pictures taken at the Panama Canal at the Wildey Theater, in Edwardsville, Ill.

The Vaudette, a Springfield, Ill., moving picture show, has a baseball team which plays nines from the vaudeville houses in that city.

Elgin, Ill., is still battling with the Sunday theater problem. It is thought the theater owners may secure enough signatures to a petition to have a referendum vote of the citizens of the city upon the question. Where showhouses are open on Sunday the pictures are given careful scrutiny by envoys of the police department.

"A censorship of parents would wipe out three-fourths of the films shown in Quincy," proclaims the Quincy, Ill., Herald. It is inclined to believe the National Board of Censorship is lax and declares that the daily releases in Quincy "do more to undo the parental teachings in well-ordered homes than almost any other influence in Quincy. Just listen to the talk of the young people when they emerge from the theaters. There is your proof."

Elmer A. Sowers, of Elgin, Ill., and Frank Barnes, formerly operator at the Lyric, in that city, have opened a moving picture show in West Chicago.

R. N. Bailey, of Peoria, Ill., has purchased the Star Theater, at Henry, Ill., and has taken possession.

The Majestic Theater, Springfield, Ill., which is now on the Allardt string of vaudeville houses, will run pictures this summer. Independent service will be used. The house already has begun to advertise the Gaumont Weekly.

The Electric Theater Advertising Company, of Dayton, Ohio, has been incorporated with capital stock of $10,000, to handle advertising in moving picture shows. The incorporators are Guy A. Edwards, Glen H. Stubbs, Jesse Ward Recher, Edna M. Recher and George P. Weed.

An entertainment committee of a Lincoln, Ill., fraternal order decided the best and cheapest way to entertain the lodge brethren was to take them to the Star Photoplay in a body and proceeded to buy the tickets. Here's a tip for many small town managers.

Harry Shelley has purchased the moving picture business at Nebo, Ill., from A. C. West.

According to Truth, a national purity organ which is fighting the white slave traffic, Duluth, Minn., has a model moving picture show ordinance and other municipalities are urged to secure the pattern. Mayor J. A. McCuen advises The Moving Picture World that later copies may be printed, but at present the text of these rigid regulations are not to be obtained.

The Lyric Theater, at Danville, Ill., controlled by the Allardt Company, will be remodeled.

Burr H. Swan, manager of the picture show at Pittsfield, Ill., whose advertising recently was praised by Mr. Sargent in the Moving Picture World, is more than a photoplay manager. He is the editor of the Pittsfield Republican, a weekly paper. He always gets out his paper the morning after elections with all the figures; other papers wait until the next week. He inaugurated a colt show in the town. He gave all the prizes himself and nearly lost some of his best advertisers, telling them to keep away. It brought a lot of people to town who spent money and the merchants were pleased. But he wouldn't let them in the next year, so they chipped in and got the best band in that part of the state to come to Pittsfield and make the lively colts step livelier. No wonder the "Old Man," as he is known, has a different picture house.

If a manager has an operator who knows his business, let him talk to the local paper sometime. It will give the public that much-desired glance behind the scenes and can go a long way toward explaining why there is little danger of a "film explosion" Lee Carroll, the Majestic operator at Jacksonville, Ill., recently told a curious reporter enough about films, rectifiers and film exchanges to figure in a nice feature story or "The Inside Workings of a Picture Show." Almost any small city daily will be glad to run a story of this sort.

The Amusement Committee of the Woman's Club of Galesburg, Ill., in its annual report says that it has visited all the moving picture shows. Its only comment upon the photoplay is, "The moving picture show on East Main Street has changed hands and has been put in first class order where it will now rank with the other amusement places of its kind in Galesburg."

The Illinois Theater, Urbana, Ill., will be devoted to moving pictures after June 8, according to a decision of the board of directors of the Illinois Theater Company. It will return to vaudeville in the fall. This place has installed a searchlight upon the roof for advertising purposes. A benefit performance was given April 28 for survivors of the ill-fated Titanic.

The Lyric Theater, Champaign, Ill., and the Gazette of that city combined forces to give a benefit April 28 for the Titanic survivors. The mayor gave special permission for the Sunday performance. High school girls sold tickets and prominent local musicians appeared upon the program.

Barring a too speedy run of a Biograph, a recent performance at the Lyric Theater, Champaign, Ill., was as nicely conducted as any in the Mississippi Valley. H. H. Johnson is the owner and manager. He doesn't know everything about the picture show business and admits it on a slide, which asks patrons to make suggestions. If we must have illustrated songs let them be sung as a young man here sang them—with voice and brains. "Oh Promise Me" was a well thought out prelude to Lubin's "Old Rice and Shoes"—a tale of a neglected wife. And where this wife in the moonlit chamber scene is willing to forgive the pianist came in with "All That I Ask Is Love." The musicians were intelligent through a three-reel show, neutral with the accompaniment where something did not suggest itself, and rising to the occasion when something strikingly appropriate demanded it. Conspicuous fire extinguishers and plainly marked exits bear out the assertion that all the known rules of city and state for safety have been met. The interior is modest but attractive. The lobby advertising is cheeringly original—a pair of old shoes and letters of rice pasted on cardboard advertised the Lubin film mentioned. The Lyric gets ten cents for its show and it's worth it.

The Crystal, in the same city, is an independent house. It gets ten cents for its show and gives value received, although a long independent program will never be wholly acceptable until the French style of comedy, such as seen in some of the releases here, is abolished. The projection is good, the pianist unobtrusive and the songs well sung. The house is all right, although it is necessary to climb to the crest of the inclined floor just after entering. When the Lyric gave a benefit for the Titanic sufferers the Crystal closed its doors and directed its patrons down the street to its competitor, an act which pleased the Champaign people very much.

The Varsity, on Main Street, Champaign, gives a long independent show. It too is a dime attraction—everybody is used to it in Champaign and pays the price willingly. The Varsity seems a popular place, judging from the patronage and the well projected pictures, satisfy and tire only the habitual photoplaygoer.

The Casino Theater, Springfield, Ill., recently installed a five-piece orchestra.

The Capital Theater and the Royal, Springfield, Ill., have installed gold-fibre curtains.

Some Springfield, Ill., manager apparently could do well by going after the noon hour trade. All are after the supper hour business, yet there are more people with leisure time at 12:30. The Milwaukee Journal recently gave a series of noon hour shows for working girls in that city and along with the moving picture theater proprietor, profited.

The Lyric, South Sixth Street, Springfield, Ill., featured the Kalem "War's Havoc" and gave a double program for ten cents. The business was satisfactory.

The movement in Lincoln, Ill., to have Sunday shows has waned, according to the press of that city. It was announced that a petition was to be presented to the city council by the managers who sought a seven-day privilege. Sentiment is against it, it is declared, and there the matter will rest.

The Majestic Theater, Peoria, Ill., has begun its summer run of pictures—three reels and a spotlight song for five cents. Charles J. Isele, treasurer of the house, will act as manager. The daily run will be from 11 a. m. to 11 p. m.

Patsy Wighton, of Seymour, Ill., has purchased a moving picture outfit and is showing in Centerville, White Heath and other towns in that vicinity.

Miss Ethel Miller, of Harrisburg, Ill., has accepted a position as musician at the Elite, in Metropolis, Ill.

Peterson & King will operate airdomes at Sycamore, Ill., and Genoa, Ill., this summer.

The Edwardsville Investment Company, owners of the Wildey Theater, Edwardsville, Ill., will open bids June 1 for the lease of the house.

William A. White and brother will open a moving picture show at 319 East State Street, Rockford, Ill., it is announced.

Dreamland Theater, Galena, Ill., gets a new front, a larger operating room and a reserve machine.

The Majestic Theater, Freeport, Ill., recently worked hand in hand with the high school athletic association, which sold a lot of tickets, for the featured "Illumination" and some other good pictures.

John S. Miller, of Sterling, Ill., donated a moving picture machine to Grace Episcopal Church, of that city, to be used in entertainments and illustrated lectures.

J. A. Peck has sold the Airdome, on Charles Street, Rockford, Ill., to Carl Bergander and A. E. Gustafson.

The crusade against Sunday picture shows in Elgin, Ill., is calling for some hair-splitting. Just what the music for a sacred film shall be is a question. "Silver Threads Among the Gold" and "My Old Kentucky Home," it is said, were stopped by the police. One of the theater managers and two local pastors conducted a newspaper discussion as to the sacredness of patriotic airs.

Press reports say that "alleged" moving pictures of the Titanic disaster were barred from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and Terre Haute, Ind., Quincy, Ill., and Peoria, Ill., protested against fake slides and films. FRANK H. MADISON.

LOUISVILLE.

UNUSUAL play is being made at present upon feature films. The organization of a special exchange to handle this sort of business has undoubtedly played a prominent part in this section of the business, for half a dozen or more of the best known houses in Louisville are getting the benefit of exclusive local privileges for notable releases.

During the past couple of weeks a couple of Louisville exhibitors have decided to taboo advertisement slides. It is averred that the public, at least the advertising public, is not meeting the show-slide with particular warmth, and that not enough business can be secured to make the shortening of the shows worth while. A concern which was specially organized to take charge of photoplay advertising has passed out of existence, and it seems that further developments must ensue before the exploitive feature of the picture show in the Falls Cities may be made sufficiently valuable for owners and exhibitors.

The Avenue, under the management of Mort Shaw, shows the games of the Colonels away from home, play by play, upon Smiley's electric baseball board. Ten-cent admission fees are the rule

The Majestic Theater is prospering upon extended lines proportionate to its unusual size and facilities for handling patronage from all over the city. The Majestic possesses a valuable feature in the Hungarian Orchestra, which plays several numbers during each show.

The Kentucky Feature Film Exchange, which was recently organized by members of the Broadway and Princess amusement companies, has begun its career energetically.

The East Broadway and West Broadway Theaters, owned by the Broadway Amusement Company, have shown the Titanic and Carpathia Warner features during the week with unusual success. According to Fred Dolle, of the Broadway company, Bison releases are always good and have established themselves as a staple with the Broadway houses.

Henry Reiss, of the Broadway Amusement Company, has gone to Cincinnati, Ohio, on a short business trip. Mr. Reiss expects to secure some ideas in the Queen City for the improved lighting system of the Ideal, a handsome new house now being erected by the Ideal Amusement Company, a subsidiary Broadway corporation, in the West End. The Ideal will open some time around July 1 and is expected to be one of the handsomest and most unusual suburban playhouses in the entire South. Mr. Reiss will return to Louisvillle in a few days, as the West End house is now in course of construction.

The Bijou Dream, which was recently purchased by the Princess Amusement Company, of this city, to add to the chain of Princess houses, has started business under its new management with great success. The Dream has been completely renovated and is showing a standard program of the usual Princess attractiveness.

The Baxter Airdome, owned by the Baxter Amusement Company, a subsidiary of the Broadway Amusement Company, opened on May 12 for the summer. The Baxter is located in the Highlands, one of Louisville's prettiest suburban sections, and has been completely remodeled for its 1912 season. The open air theater is under the management of English Kendall and its program is chiefly composed of the latest associated releases.

The Novelty, owned by the Falls Cities Amusement Company, is running The Crystal, another local Falls Cities house, a close race for supremacy in the matter of getting business. The Princess Victoria, advertised as the smallest woman in the world, has closed a successful engagement with the Falls Cities Company and has gone to Chicago.

M. Switow, president of the Falls Cities Amusement Company, is negotiating with the members of the Tavern Hotel Company, of New Albany, Ind., directly across the Ohio river from Louisville, and may probably rebuild the Grand Theater, in that city, as the result. The hotel company has offered to lease any upper floors which Mr. Switow will add to the Grand, for the purpose of affording more room for the patrons of the well-known New Albany Hotel. The present trend of business with the Grand may justify Mr. Switow in making the enlargements desired by the neighboring bonifaces.

The Fidelity Trust Company, of Louisville, as trustee of the estate of Mrs. Martha Stannard, deceased, of Richmond, Va., has sold to the Virginia Theater Company, of that city, a building and lot fronting forty-five feet on Eighth Street, between Franklin and Grace, in Richmond. The company will erect a modern moving picture theater of considerable capacity on the site. W. G. Neal, who is well-known in Louisville by reason of local relationships, is president of the Virginia Theater Company.

H. H. Phillips and Woodson Moss, owners of the Lyric Theater in Winchester, Ky., have leased property in the downtown district of that city from the Lexington Lodge of Elks for a period of five years and will remodel the present building to constitute one of the handsomest moving picture theaters in Central Ketucky, a sister to the Lyric house. The auditorium of the new Phillips & Moss Theater will be 116 by 28 feet in dimension. Work of equipping the establishment for business is to be begun at once and rushed to completion.

A. D. Rogers and Ernest Foote, well-known exhibitors in Owensboro, Ky., have leased the People's Theater in that city, an established house for "legit." and will present pictures and vaudeville therein for the summer. The People's, according to its lessees, is to become one of the best photoplay houses in western Kentucky for the summer of 1912.

Maas' Orchestra, which has been furnishing the musical programme for the People's, in Owensboro, Ky., has left for Paducah, Ky., where it will work in the Arcade Theater. The orchestra is under the direction of A. W. Maas.

On May 3, the entire proceeds of the day's performances at the Grand Theater, in Frankfort, Ky., were donated by the owner of the Grand, H. J. Lyons, to the King's Daughter's Hospital, in the Bluegrass capital. The benefit netted a neat sum for the charitable institution, inasmuch as the admission fee on King's Daughters' Day was raised to 10 cents and was accompanied by unusual patronage.

The box office of the Hippodrome Theater, one of the best known houses in Lexington, Ky., was broken open by unknown thieves a short time ago and $75 in cash was taken, along with $1,500 worth of tickets for the performance of Jan Kubelik, the famous violinist, who was booked to appear in Lexington for one day only. The issue of tickets was immediately recalled and substitute pasteboards were provided, making this portion of the thieves' booty valueless. The police are working on the case.

The "Hipp" Theater, in Jackson, Ky., has been purchased by Sewell B. Williams and Frank Osborn. The new owners propose to conduct the house upon a higher plane than ever before and a successful career seems assured.

Through the action of Fire and Police Commissioner Utley, of Memphis, Tenn., backed by the popular verdict of Memphis at large, moving picture reels portraying the Titanic disaster or any phase thereof are to be barred from the Bluff City. Commissioner Utley avers that Titanic pictures can be nothing more than fakes and his opinion that the public has read and heard enough of the holocaust is backed by a majority of Memphians. The Tennessee city is one of the few yet discovered which has refused to allow the Titanic feature reels to be shown within its precincts.

W. H. Wasserman, manager of the Rex and Crystal moving picture theaters in Nashville, Tenn., has goen to Knoxville, Tenn., to superintend the completion of a Rex Theater in that city.

The Bijou Dream, one of the prettiest and best-known Market Street theaters in Louisville, has been purchased by the Princess Amusement Company, from the Standard Amusement Company. The Dream is to be continued upon the usual high-class scale of Princess operation.

The Novelty, owned by the Falls Cities Amusement Company, attracted more business during the second week of the engagement of the Princess Victoria than during the first week. The diminutive miss of twenty-two summers, no larger than a toy doll, captivated a lion's share of local photoplay patrons. A Rex comedy feature film, showing the trend of modern fashions from embroidered stockings to beflowered millinery, scored heavily with feminine patrons of The Novelty.

"There is not a vestige of room for complaint regarding business," said Louis J. Dittmar, owner of the Majestic and Royal Theaters, who has been elected vice-president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky. "I returned a few days ago from the Bluegrass meeting at Lexington. It was certainly successful to a degree surpassing the greatest expectations entertained by anyone in the Bluegrass industry."

H. H. Phillips, a well-known exhibitor of Winchester, Ky., has completed plans for the opening of a new theater in that city. Mr. Phillips has leased a commodious building in the heart of Winchester, which is to be remodeled at once into an up-to-date show house, with a seating capacity of 500 persons. The house is to be outlined in electric lights, an innovation in the Eastern Kentucky city.

The Pastime Theater, in Winchester, Ky., has added vaudeville attractions to its programme. The owners of the house have elevated the scale of admission to 10 cents, following the introduction of special acts, and propose to round out the most successful season in the career of the Pastime during the coming summer.

June 1 has been set as the opening date for the Gem Theater in Maysville, Ky. Sherman Arn, owner of the Gem, has been elected second vice-president of the Bluegrass League of Exhibitors, and proposes to give Maysville the finest pictures ever enjoyed. The Gem will be one of the handsomest houses in the eastern part of the state, with a considerable seating capacity.

T. A. Nolan, of Cincinnati, O., owner of The Pastime Theater in Maysville, Ky., and one of the best-known exhibitors in the Ohio Valley, is a benedict. Mr. Nolan was married a short time ago to Miss Anna Lee Riley, of Maysville, one of the prettiest and most popular girls in Eastern Kentucky.

The Colonial Amusement Company, of Lexington, Ky., has opened a new house in Paris, Lexington's sister Bluegrass city. The new Paris theater is called the Alamo, and seats about 250 persons. It is finished attractively and a program of first-run pictures is provided to insure business of the type with which its christening was celebrated.

L. H. Ramsey, of Lexington, Ky., recently elected treasurer of the Kentucky League of exhibitors, has returned from Charleston, W. Va. While in Charleston Mr. Ramsey completed arrangements for leasing a new theater in that city, which is now in course of erection. The new West Virginia capitol show-house, according to Mr. Ramsey, will probobly be called The Hoppodrome, as its twin establishment in Lexington os known. Straight moving pictures will be provided in accommodations not to be surpassed by those of any other theater in the state.

A $25,000 stock company has been organized in Pineville, Ky., to back a moving picture enterprise. Contracts for the erection of a $25,000 show-house have been awarded to W. M. Jones, of Barbourville, Ky., and it is planned to make Pineville's newest and largest theater one of the finest in the Southeastern portion of the state. Mr. Jones will commence work upon the structure within thirty days, rushing it to completion so that the house may open for business by the middle of summer.

Victor Warren is building and equipping an airdome for the exhibition of moving pictures during the summer in Somerset, Ky. A feature of the Warren airdome is to be complete electrical equipment of a type unusual in a community of the size of Somerset.

A suit to throw the Alcazar Theater, of Bellevue, Ky., into bankruptcy, has been instituted by Hamilton Williams against Henry and Joseph Schatzmann, owners of The Alcazar. The petition of the plaintiffs was granted by Judge Yungblut, of the Campbell County Circuit Court, and Master Commissioner Samuel Anderson has been appointed receiver for the playhouse.

E. K. Lyons, of Lexington, Ky., has converted a building which he owns in the downtown district of Frankfort into a model moving picture theater. The new Frankfort Theater has been opened for business and is already established as an institution with Central Kentucky photoplay enthusiasts.

Moving picture capitalists of Madisonville, Ky., are negotiating with Col. J. D. Powers, of Louisville, for the purchase of downtown property which he owns in Owensboro, Ky. The Madisonville syndicate proposes to erect and operate an up-to-date theater for straight moving picture exhibitions in the Western Kentucky industrial center, if the purchase of the site may be effected.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

NEW ENGLAND.

MR. E. D. ELDRIDGE, manager of the Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., passed up the regular "legitimate" attractions last week, and presented Howe's moving pictures, and some Kinemacolor subjects. The big theaters are falling into line quite steadily throughout the New England States.

On Monday evening, April 29, the Moving Picture Operators' Local 182, went on a strike in several Boston houses, to insist on their wage scale. The Jolliette, Olympic, Niagara, Ideal and Paradise Theaters had not signed the new wage scale. The Palace and Comique Theaters had not signed by 8 o'clock—the last minute allowed—and the operators walked out of the booths. These houses were both closed for about a half hour, at which time the wage scale was agreed to. The Jolliette Theater closed at 8 o'clock, and did not reopen until the next morning. The Old South and New Washington Theaters signed the agreement after they appreciated the fact that the operators meant business. The Union, many months ago, submitted its agreement for a minimum wage of $20 for a six-day week, and 42 hours as the maximum for the six days. Sunday night work to be paid for at the same rate. The local had been in conference for months with owners who had not agreed. Last week it was decided by the international executive board that the Boston Union would enforce its scale at every house, and this decision was carried out. The plan of action was like this: At 7 o'clock the operator at each of the more than 40 houses which had not signed the scale, should present a duplicate copy of it to the owner or manager, with the statement that unless it were returned to him, signed, before 8 o'clock, the operator would refuse to start the show. The local certainly gave the houses every possible chance to do the right thing, and acted in a very creditable manner.

Manager George Appleby, of the Star Theater, Boston, was right on his job when the operators at the Comique and Palace struck, and immediately had a sign painted announcing that the Star was a Union house, and the first one in Boston to sign the agreement. The sign was very attractive, with the I. A. T. S. E. crest at the top, and "Local 182," in the very middle. Manager Appleby stated that he reaped a harvest of extra dimes while his competitors were searching for pen and ink with which to sign the wage scale of the local.

The Scenic Theater, Hartford, Conn., a photoplay house, has closed, and it is not known when it will reopen.

Manager L. B. Zimmerman, of the Gaiety Theater, Springfield, Mass., reports very good business with a straight show of photoplays.

The Town Hall, of Holliston, Mass., is giving photoplay shows three nights weekly, and reports good business.

The City Hall, of Waterbury, Conn., was destroyed by fire this week. It was a very old building, but exhibitions of pictures were often given there.

The Lake Hoag Theater, a summer park near Milford, Mass., wil soon open for the season.

"Purgatory and Paradise," the 4-reel feature production, controlled by the Superior Feature Film Company, will soon be seen all over New England, as Mr. Rosenberg, of the company, has just completed a thorough trip through these states. He reports a good demand for "Purgatory and Paradise."

Governor Foss, of Massachusetts, has just signed a bill authorizing the city of Boston to widen Avery Street. This is of interest to local photoplay men, as the Pastime Theater is on the corner of Avery and Washington Streets. It has not been decided which side of Avery Street is to be widened, but the Pastime hopes it will not be on their side.

Mr. John J. Barry, former international president, and now business manager of the Boston Theatrical Employees' Union, reported a most pleasing condition in the national organization. Mr. Barry stated that employers evinced a willingness to treat with their employees in relation to the wage scale and working conditions. At the last meeting, money was voted in benefits for sick members, and a committee was appointed to look out for the unemployed members.

The annual benefit performance of the Lynn Lodge, T. M. A., will be held in the Olympia Theater, May 21. Manager Lord of the Olympia, believes it well worth while to give his house over for this purpose, as it brings with it a lot of free publicity and good-will.

Holyoke, Mass., is in line for a new theater, which is to be located at Suffolk Street and Newton Place. The plans call for a 6-story building, four of which are to be used by the theater. Mr. C. A. Rackliffe, the main promoter, told the writer that the house will seat about 1,100, with a balcony. The lot of land is 100 by 90 feet. Plans are being completed by Mr. G. P. B. Alderman, and the house will represent an outlay of about $100,000. Work will commence as soon as the buildings now on the property have been razed. This project is the direct result of work done by the Holyoke Board of Trade, who elected Mr. N. P. Avery as chairman of the theater committee, whose duty it was to secure a new theater for Holyoke. Motion pictures and vaudeville are chosen for the new house. About the only opposition is the Holyoke Opera House, owned by D. O. Gilmore, of Springfield, and managed by Mr. Shea. Present Mayor J. J. White, of Holyoke, has persistently advocated a new theater in all his public speeches.

The Park Theater, Boston, a "legitimate" theater, will change to a photoplay house for the single week of May 13, when it will present the Paul J. Rainey African hunt pictures, which come to Boston direct from the Lyceum Theater, New York City, where they gained great popularity.

Mr. Charles L. Gill, manager of the Cambridge Theater, Cambridge, Mass., has resigned his position, and left for New York City. Mr. Gill tendered his resignation as the direct result of some family troubles.

The Kinemacolor pictures were placed on exhibition at the Opera House, Bangor, Me., by Manager F. A. Owen. The reels were found very good business pullers. This is only another instance of motion pictures finding themselves in the best theater in the city. Billie Burke was the last attraction at the Opera House before the Kinemacolor exhibition.

Starting with the week of May 20, the Orpheum Theater, of Savin Rock Park, a summer resort near New Haven, Conn., will begin its season of vaudeville and pictures. This house has a seating capacity of nearly 1,300, and will give a matinee and evening performance every day.

Mr. S. Z. Poli's theater, New Haven, Conn., will shut down on the vaudeville and photoplay game on May 20. A stock company will be installed for the summer.

The Jacques Theater, of Waterbury, Conn., has quit the photoplay and vaudeville programs, and is offering stock company attractions over the summer months.

"Dante's Inferno" was found an excellent attraction this week, when Manager Irvine exhibited the Divine comedy at his new Park Theater, Manchester, N. H.

On Thursday evening, May 2, a committee from the Moving Picture Operators' Union, Local 182, of Boston, had a talk with Manager "Cy" Bunce, of the Olympia, East Boston, the Niagara, Roxbury, and of the Scenic Temple, Chelsea, regarding the new minimum wage scale. Manager Bunce had not signed the agreement, and the committee went over the matter with him. It is understood that the three houses controlled by Mr. Bunce will soon be in line with the other Greater Boston theaters, who have agreed to the scale.

The resignation of David Cohen, former business agent of the Local 182, has been accepted. Mr. "Billy" Frank, formerly vice-president, is the new business agent. The dues have been raised by vote of the body to $1 per month.

The Savoy Theater, Fall River, Mass., looks much better since the improvements have been made in the main entrance.

It is understood that the Circle Theater, Hartford, Conn., has been sold to Mr. L. McPartland, who will continue to operate the Circle as a straight picture house.

Mr. J. H. Singleton, of Woonsocket, R. I., has instituted moving pictures in the state sanitorium for consumptives, at Wallum Lake, R. I. It is understood that the pictures will be exhibited on the lawn near the sanatorium, and that regular performances will be given throughout the spring and summer. It is believed that this is the very first time anything of this sort has ever been attempted. It is a great idea, and should prove of great value.

The new Bijou Theater now being built in New Haven, Conn., by Mr. S. Z. Poli, will be open by June 15, according to an announcement. This house will seat 2,500, and will be one of Mr. Poli's best theaters. The usual brand of vaudeville and pictures will be offered. William Fox has the Grand Opera House in New Haven, and keen competition between these houses is inevitable.

The Theater Comique, Boston, secured the moving pictures of Sarah Bernhardt in "Camille," which were exhibited during the week of May 6.

EDWIN THANHOUSER, President
NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

An Open Letter to Independent Exhibitors:

A few days ago a number of Independent exchanges met and conspired to cancel their standing orders for Thanhouser film. The story of the why and wherefore of this political move is a long one and doesn't interest you, who simply want and will insist upon getting the service you are entitled to. The cancellation of the Thanhouser films by a number of Independent exchanges means that these exchanges will no longer supply you with the best make of Independent film on the market. Your need of the Thanhouser Two-a-week was completely forgotten. In their heedless desire to control the film business in their territory, irrespective of the rights of others, these exchanges are putting every Independent exhibitor at an unwarranted disadvantage. Ordinarily the exhibitor is too busy running his business to bother about peanut politics, but when it robs him of the feature of his program he is not going to stand for it. Are you going to stand for this gross injustice? Will you permit any exchange to deprive you of the mainstay of your program and at the same time have him ask you to pay him money for it?

We do not care to stop with any exchange's assertion that you do not want Thanhouser films. We want to know FROM YOU if you want them. If you do, send us a card saying, "I want Thanhouser films," with your address and exchange, and we'll see that you get them.

Where Thanhouser films have been cancelled, we want you to know that an exchange will be placed in that territory, handling Thanhouser films. The exhibitor is going to have Thanhouser films, despite the short-sighted, unbusinesslike attitude of some of the present Independent exchanges. No one realizes better than the Independent exhibitor the value of Thanhouser films in their effort to combat the opposition of the Licensed program, and no power is greater than the Exhibitor's voice when he tells the exchange man—"IF YOU CAN'T GIVE ME THANHOUSER FILMS, I'LL GO WHERE I CAN GET THEM."

Sincerely yours, THANHOUSER CO.

CINES.

THE LOTTERY OF LOVE (May 28).—Alfred, a superfluous youth, woos two sisters, Bertha and Florence, and writes a note to each asking her to be his wife. The sisters compare notes, and angrily decide to get revenge. They convince their maiden aunt, Bertha, whom they know secretly admires Alfred, that one of the letters is intended for her, and make an appointment for her to meet him in the garden that evening.

The ardent lover rushes to his supposed sweetheart, who is heavily veiled, and renews his proposal of marriage. In the midst of his endearments, he is suddenly confronted by the sisters and the rest of the family. He raises the lady's veil, and, horrified, attempts to escape, but is seized by a stalwart relative, who insists upon the marriage. Alfred meekly submits. There is nothing else to do.

FOUNTAINS OF ROME (May 28).—An extremely interesting topical subject showing the many beautiful fountains which add so much to the picturesqueness of the city.

THE BOGUS PROFESSOR (June 1).—William is madly in love with Ada, the charming daughter of a wealthy merchant, and wishes very much to secure an introduction to her parents. An opportunity finally arrives; the young lady's music teacher is suddenly taken ill, and a good friend takes advantage of the situation to introduce William as a capable substitute, although the latter doesn't have the faintest idea of music.

However, the lesson prove a success, and the clever deceiver gets a chance to ingratiate himself into the esteem of the unsuspicious father, who finally consents to their marriage.

After the honeymoon trip, William is forced to confess his deception, and the stern parent is just ready to go into a terrible rage, when the young couple apply the necessary oil to the troubled waters by promising to make a musician of their first child.

ROME ON THE TIBER (June 1).—A pleasing scenic showing many of the famous bridges which span the Tiber, these are included among the most interesting sights of the city.

EDISON.

JIM'S WIFE (May 28).—Jim's wife, Nell, is the idol of the lumber camp in the Maine woods, where Jim is boss. One day there drifts into camp a man named Tom Taylor, a rough woodsman, who applies to Jim for work. Jim gives him a job and invites him to take pot luck with Nell and himself. He is at once attracted by Nell's comely appearance and determines to win her. He contrives to meet Nell whenever possible and during Jim's absence becomes more and more forward. Nell, however, has no feeling but hatred for Tom, and warns him that if he persists in his attentions, she will tell Jim.

Tom is caught under a falling tree and, Jim not suspecting his true character, takes him to his own cabin to receive proper nursing. Tom takes advantage of this unlooked for opportunity to force his attentions upon Nell who is finally forced to protect herself by telling Jim. Jim is for giving Tom a good thrashing, but wishing to avoid further trouble, Nell persuades Jim to content himself by turning him out of doors.

Tom, furious at this, believes he still could win Nell if Jim were out of the way. To this end, he lures Jim into the woods through a false message, then waylays him and leaves him unconscious in the road where the giant log-hauler will run over him. Tom then makes his way to Jim's cabin where in a drunken frenzy he informs Nell what he has done. Nell tries to escape but he only laughs at her, locks the door and seizes her in his arms. Nell in defending herself, grasps the lighted lamp and strikes him over the head. Tom falls unconscious and Nell rushes out to save Jim from death. She arrives just in time to stop the log-hauler and with the assistance of the crew Jim is brought to his senses.

Arriving back in camp they see Tom about to emerge from the cabin. Tom sees Jim and locks himself in the cabin where he awaits Jim with loaded revolver in hand. Nell tries to persuade Jim not to enter the cabin, but Jim, bent on having it out with Tom, insists, so Nell goes to arouse the men in camp and prevent the encounter if possible. Jim, however, enters the cabin by a rear door, and, taking Tom unawares, gets the drop on him with his gun.

Tom refuses Jim's offer to fight it out and Jim, disgusted with the coward goes to the door to kick him out. As soon as his back is turned, Tom reaches for his revolver, but before he can pull the trigger, Jim sends a bullet crashing through his shoulder.

THE PASSION FLOWER (May 29).—The passion flower is one of rare beauty and is exceedingly attractive in color and formation, deriving its title from the fact that it is symbolic of the passion period of Christianity. The color of the flower is white and royal purple and when seen upon the vines with the green foliage surrounding it, it makes a pretty sight.

Around this flower is centralized the idea of this comedy but it has however, no connection with its religious significance. The scenes are laid in Bermuda and deal with the romantic love affair of a young lady tourist and her three ardent admirers, one of them being an English army officer. Each of these gentlemen in question is desirous of winning the heart and hand of the young heiress but having three strings to her bow, she is quite undecided which one has really won her admiration.

While riding to the races on Fair Day she chances to see the blossom of the passion flower in a nearby garden and immediately expresses her desire to possess it, to her waiting admirers. The possession of this flower proves for more troublesome than they had anticipated, and after many efforts to fulfill her wish, they are forced to admit defeat. Nevertheless, during the course of the day, each one in turn succeeds in asking for her hand and each one is interrupted at the critical moment, and so by evening, they are in doubt as to which one will prove to be the lucky gentleman. With the caprice of a woman she writes a note to the man of her choice, stating that if he will meet her at a certain spot on the following day she will give him her answer.

This letter is given to the daughter of a livery stable owner to deliver to the gentleman whose name is on the envelope. Curiosity gets the better of the little maid and while she is reading the contents of this epistle of love, the envelope, containing the name of the gentleman, is carried away by the winds and eventually finds its resting place in the interior of a hungry goat browsing upon the hillside. The little maid, not having the slightest idea to which of the three gentlemen the note belongs, is in a quandry what to do, but at last hits upon a plan and so, to make matters sure, she cleverly contrives to have each one of the gentlemen secure the note in turn, thereby starting a series of humorous situations which follow rapidly one upon the other and terminate in two gentlemen finding lodgings in a country jail, while the English officer proceeds to make arrangements for his forthcoming marriage to the heiress.

VIEWS IN CALCUTTA, INDIA (May 31).—Among the many scenes is a view of a beautiful temple, a tribute to the work of man, and passing from there we see the work of nature summed up in one hundred and thirty-nine years producing the great Banyan tree. This is eighty-five feet high and has two hundred and fifty knotted trunks to support its gigantic spread. A view looking down the avenue of royal palms shows the broad leaves as they embrace above the roadway and send their shadows, cool and welcome, down upon the sun-beaten natives as they pass beneath their natural green.

Their majesties King George V and Queen Mary of England, contribute to the interest of this film; two distinct views being taken of them upon their arrival and departure from Calcutta amid the royal regalia befitting the crown.

Selections of the Calcutta Durbar are shown with many huge elephants which took part in the ceremony. Their trappings are wonderful in their Oriental splendor.

ESSANAY.

MARGARET'S AWAKENING (May 28).—A little rogue is Margaret and when her mama refuses to take her riding in the auto, she protests strenuously against going to bed. However, the maid and the cook are expecting "callers" for the evening, so Margaret is tucked into the covers with her dolly, the light turned low and a "help's" reunion is held on the back porch. Presently mama and papa return from their ride, the "callers" hastily exit, the maid assures her mistress she has kept good watch on Margaret and the household retires. Next morning Margaret determines to tell papa of her treatment of the night before, slips from her bed in her pajamas and slippers and, with her dolly in her arms, runs out to the garage, climbs into the back seat of the auto and falls sound asleep. Papa comes in and drives off to business, finds he has to appear in court that morning to bail out a friend and leaves the auto standing before the court-building. Of course Margaret awakens and, dazed by her surroundings, sets up a lusty protest. A kind policeman discovers her, takes the number of the car, learns the address of papa, calls up the house and finds mama and the maid in a state of terror over Margaret's disappearance. Another officer is sent to the house for particulars, while Margaret is taken into the court-room where papa recognizes her and obtains permission to leave at once for home. Of course he is arrested for speeding, taken to another station, mama is informed by phone and, after considerable red-tape, Margaret's little prank is finally straightened out and everybody returns home happy.

THE WHITE HOPE (May 30).—Tim Sharkey, a worthless good-for-nothing, can't find work and his spouse tirades gloriously in his ears while she rams the family wash around the tub. Tim sits at the table smoking and jawing and suddenly sees an ad in the paper for a pugilistic "white hope" who can earn a barrel of money trimming aspiring pugs. With beautiful visions of feints and uppercuts before him, Tim slowly dozes off—and has a most wonderful dream. He imagines himself the only and original "white hope," and sets out for the home of the fight promoter. On the way he demonstrates his ability by thrashing a bully who is abusing his wife, helps waft a trunk into a wagon that two men couldn't get off the ground, loads a cart with fallen crates with one wave of his hand and almost blows some fancy shrubbery out of the ground for self amusement. Arriving at the home of the fight promoter Tim slams the punching-bag from its hook and almost kills the promoter with one blow, while he puffs out a lamp at a distance of ten feet. Forthwith the promoter escorts him to the Athletic Club and Tim is given a try-out with a pugilistic trainer. Once the gloves are on his hands, Tim proves a fizzle and is being beaten to a pulp when suddenly—he rouses up to find his angry spouse amusing herself by breaking the wash-board over his head. Tim tries to seek a haven of safety, but wifie lifts him into a tub of hot suds and we leave Tim a sadder, madder and wetter man.

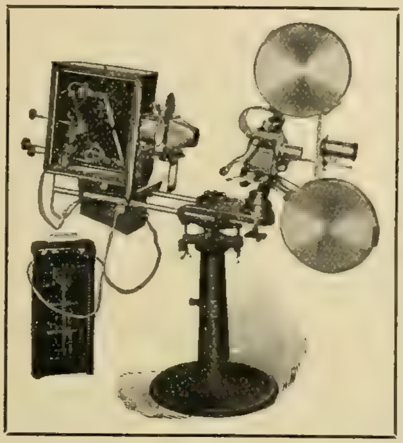
THE LAUREL-WREATH OF FAME (May 31).—Guido Marcello, a young composer, is madly infatuated with Maria Medici, a pretty singer. Maria sings his first composition and, overcome with her beauty and his emotions, Guido begs her to become his wife. Maria, however, prefers her musical career to marriage and rejects Guido's proposal. Heartbroken he returns home. Later the death of his mother leaves him entirely alone in the world. Years later Guido is housed in a wretched garret, poverty-stricken and still searching for musical fame. Meanwhile, Maria has become a noted prima donna. One day Guido, in passing the theater, sees the posters announcing Maria's grand concert. Sick at heart he turns away only to come face to face with Maria. Wishing to avoid recognition, Guido goes on to his lodgings. Maria has recognized him, sends her maid to secure his address, then visits him in the garret. Guido confesses his poverty and shows her his rejected music. One piece attracts Maria's attention, she sings it over and instantly agrees to render it that night at the concert. Guido refuses her money for it, but thanks her for her aid and Maria leaves with the song. That night her concert is a great triumph and Guido's music has set the critics agog. Meanwhile, Guido's brutal landlord threatens him with eviction and, during his absence, ruins his violin and destroys his music. Guido returns, discovers the awful situation, drives the landlord from the garret and, worn out with hunger and exhaustion, becomes delirious. Maria and her delighted friends now enter to tell him of his fame, only to find a gibbering ghost of poor Guido. His reason partly returns at hearing Maria sing his music but, on realizing he is famous, is stricken and dies while Maria sobs out her grief over his wasted body.

BRONCHO BILLY'S BIBLE (June 1).—Broncho Billy and his pal, after robbing the stage-coach, divide the loot and part company. Among the valuables in his share, Broncho finds a well-worn Bible and, after skimming over the pages with a grim smile, he puts it in an inside pocket and rides into town. In the saloon, a poker game is flourishing and "Quick-Draw" Kelly, a notorious cheat and gun-man, is cleaning the cowboys of their earnings. Broncho sits in the game, detects Kelly sliding an ace from the top of his boot, calls his cheating at the point of his gun, brands Kelly with disgrace and kicks him out. Burning with revenge, Kelly tries to kill Broncho with a shot through the open door, but the bullet lodges in the Bible and saves Broncho's life. Picking the bullet from the pages, Broncho replaces the holy book in his pocket, rushes out, mounts and starts after the escaping riffian. After a thrilling chase, both dismount and take to the rocks. Higher and higher Kelly ascends until the distant plains stretch before him miles below. Broncho now rolls a heavy boulder off to one side of Kelly, who instantly empties his gun in the direction of the sound, thinking it to be Broncho. Before he can reload, Broncho corners him and a terrific hand-to-hand struggle now ensues on the very brink of the yawning chasm. Back and forth they sway until Broncho forces Kelly to his knees, then picks him up bodily and is about to cast him over the precipice, when the Bible falls from his pocket and Broncho sees the words: "Thou Shalt Not Kill" open before him. For a moment he fights with himself, then allows Kelly to escape unmolested. Bible in hand, he finds a seat against the rocks and begins the faithful study of God's Word, and the following Sunday finds him in the church for the first time in his life.

ECLIPSE.

SLIPPERY TOM (May 29).—Tom is a remarkably clever rogue. He is always getting into mischief, and has many hairbreadth escapes from the police. One day, after one of his pranks, the minion of the law seems determined to capture him. More than once he appears to have the slippery fellow in his clutches, but Tom disappears in the most astonishing manner.

WHAT YOU GET!



AFTER you have listened to all the big talk of other manufacturers—After all is said and done—What interests you most when you select a machine is what you get.

We claim—and we can prove it—that in the MOTIOGRAPH at $225.00, you get more real value than you can obtain in any other machine on earth, at the price

Gears of solid steel and each tooth cut on our own machines—Bushings of phosphor-bronze and made in our own plant—Quality of material and workmanship unexcelled.

We could cut down our cost $50.00 and no one but an expert would know it—That doesn't mean it wouldn't be found out later on, for it would be, and "later-on" is not a good time to find out things about the machine you buy. Find it out before you buy.

It is a fact—we could cut the heart right out of the MOTIOGRAPH. and no one could tell it by simply looking at the machine. It would still look handsome and efficient but it wouldn't have the stuff in it, the material and workmanship, the qualities that have forced its recognition on the public as the one and only machine of standard quality.

The 1912 MOTIOGRAPH is worth seeing, worth studying, and worth buying—Made in various equipments and range in price of $225.00 to $350.00—Send for catalog.

ROPE MAKING BY HAND IN KENT, ENGLAND (May 29).—An extremely interesting industrial subject, showing how the raw hemp is prepared, then woven into strands, and finally twisted into three men rope.

GLIMPSES OF BELGIUM (May 29).—A series of remarkable pictures showing views of the Cities of Brussels, Liege and Namur, several scenes along the canals, and the picturesque countryside.

KALEM.

THE FIGHTING DERVISHES OF THE DESERT (May 27).—Hassan Ali, an Arab Sheik, sees Zahrah, daughter of the Coptic High Priest, and falls in love with her at first sight. The next day he determines to talk with the maiden and consequently he returns to the spot where he first saw her. There he awaits Zahrah and when she appears he impulsively declares his love. Zahrah is apparently impressed by his sincerity, but tells him he must obtain her father's permission to pay court to her. He returns to his camp in the desert and sends an envoy with presents to the High Priest asking for permission to wed Zahrah. The High Priest refuses and announces that Mohammedan and Christian cannot wed. This news angers the Arab Sheik and a band of fighting Dervishes which arrive at his camp, on their way to massacre the Christians, gives him an opportunity to avenge himself. Plans are laid for the destruction of the Coptic village but the fanatics have scarcely departed when Hassan Ali has a change of heart and sends a messenger to warn the Christians. While instructing the messenger, Ali has been overheard by one of the Arabs who gives chase and shoots the runner. The Dervishes attack the church while services are in progress; the High Priest is killed and the majority of the worshipers are put to the sword. Rushing into the thick of the fight, Hassan Ali eventually finds Zahrah and aids her to escape. After the fanatics have departed, the remaining Copts who have managed to flee, meet in the ruins of the old Pagan temple at Luxor and give thanks for their preservation. Hassan Ali joins Zahrah and adopts the Christian faith. That night Zahrah and the Arab Sheik are married. The next day we see them mounted on camels, riding to Sheik Hassan's home in the desert.

THE GENT FROM HONDURAS (May 29).—Our old friend, Roost Sweet, of Bucktown, New Orleans, falls for the charms of a New York manicurist of dusky color. Roost consults a palmist and is told that he will be lucky in a love affair. The next day Roost visits Lawyer Moose and hires him to write a proposal of marriage to the manicure lady. The girl answers his note, saying that she will marry him if he will secure for her an introduction to the "Gent from Honduras" at the coming ball. The untiring lover does as he is bid, but when the manicurist meets the "Gent from Honduras," it is all off with Roost.

LUXOR, EGYPT (May 29).—We first visit the native market at Luxor. Strolling through the town we are attracted by the work of a native cobbler. As we come to the river front we are interested in watshing the work of the water carriers of the Nile and the Arab ferry presents an odd sight. The street along the river front of this primitive Egyptian city is a quaint thoroughfare where many unusual things take place.

INTO THE JUNGLE (May 31).—Ralph and Gordon are both in love with Mary and the former attempts to propose, but cannot summon sufficient courage. Mary understands the young man and suggests that he leave a note in the trunk of an old tree. Taking heart from this encouragement, Ralph writes a message and places it at the "sweethearts' post office." Gordon, watching the affair from a distance, comes up, reads the note, destroys half of it, and places the balance in the tree. When Mary reads the mutilated note, the meaning has been entirely changed by the omission of the stolen half, and she becomes angry at Ralph's seeming heartlessness. The next day she denounces Ralph in such a manner that he impulsively leaves for Africa. A short time after his departure Gordon, through the aid of Mary's grandmother, persuades the girl to marry him. Feeling piqued at Ralph's treatment, she prepares for the wedding, but when the final day arrives, she realizes she is making a mistake and is consequently overjoyed when Gordon's better nature asserts itself. He declares he has been unfair and volunteers to follow Ralph to Africa, hoping to bring him back. With a competent guide Gordon penetrates the African jungles and approaches Ralph's camp, but while lying in his tent he is bitten by a venomous snake. He rushes out in delirium and his ravings are heard by Ralph. Quick aid is given to Gordon and his life is saved, although the amputation of his arm is necessary. Gordon rapidly gains strength and the two men return to America where Ralph and Mary are reunited.

LUBIN.

THE SENORITA'S BUTTERFLY (May 27).—Delores, daughter of a wealthy Castilian, has been betrothed, since infancy, to Don Jose Vildantes, but as the two grow older, her dislike for the man increases. The Don pleads a hopeless case, and it is only at the earnest solicitation of her parents that she accepts his invitation for a drive through the park, during which he makes his last plea and receives a decisive negative reply. The handsome young Carlos is leaving his own manor as Don Jose and Delores drive past, and, seeing the beautiful Senorita, becomes infatuated. Carlos continues his stroll, which leads him later to the gate of Hernandez Manor, just in time to see the brougham, containing Don Jose and the "fair one," enter. A few days later, Carlos again strolls in the direction of Delores' home, where he sees her with net in hand, chasing butterflies. Carlos steals inside and conceals himself, but a tip of a plume in his hat is seen by Delores and, thinking it a butterfly, she rushes forward and quickly brings her net over Carlos' head. Carlos jumps up, but Delores, frightened, runs away to the head gardener, telling him of the happening. The gardner comes up as Carlos is removing the net from his head, and, leading him to the gate, points to a sign, "Private Grounds, etc." Finding it impossible to forget the fair Senorita, Carlos, calling his own gardener, swears him to great secrecy and demands of him his peon garments. Carlos, in the garb of a peon, returns to Hernandez Manor and secures employment as the gardener's helper. Her parents call upon Padre, seeking his aid and influence to compel Delores to marry Don Jose, and it is while she and the Padre are walking through the garden, that Don Carlos is discovered and recognized by the Padre. Carlos acknowledges his identity, and, taking the Padre into his confidence, tells of his love for Delores, and the Padre in return, tells Carlos that Delores is engaged to Jose, even though she herself had no say in the matter. Realizing the utter futility of his task in aiding Jose, the Padre tells Carlos that he will remain neutral and allow the "best man" to win. A few hours later, Carlos sees Delores again chasing butterflies, and, looking about him, sees one on a nearby shrub. Catching the butterfly, he places it on the end of a straw, and hiding behind a bush, holds the butterfly over his head. Delores comes up, sees the butterfly, and again catches Carlos, as well as the butterfly in her net. Fearing that she had hurt the poor gardener, Delores is very profuse in her apologies. Seeing his opportunity, Carlos feigns being blinded, and holding his head close to Delores, realizes his dream of heavenly bliss, as she looks into his eyes. It is needless to say that Delores marries Carlos, for he is the man she loves.

THE PUPPET'S HOUR (May 29).—Ted is a worshiper of feminine beauty. On New Year's Eve he writes to his sister, telling her that he may break his engagement with Beth, as her plainness gets on his nerves. He also writes a note to Beth, explaining that he cannot watch the New Year in with her as he had accepted an invitation to a stag. The servant who delivers the notes, mixes them and Beth receives the one intended for Ted's sister. After reading it, she sends back his ring. Meanwhile in a toy shop in the same city, the life-sized puppets come to life for one hour to celebrate New Year's Eve, and Mignon, the society puppet, begs for one hour of the world. The others consent, providing she returns at the stroke of twelve. If she fails to do so, she will turn into an old crone. She leaves the shop and wanders into the house where Ted is dining, and her presence causes quite a disturbance. Ted immediately falls in love with her beauty, and draws her into the conservatory for a tete-a-tete. So absorbed is the puppet in the charming Ted, that she forgets the hour, and, as he is about to kiss her, she turns into an old crone in his arms. Ted, disgusted at the sight, returns to his rooms, and finds the ring awaiting him. Appreciating at last his sweetheart's value, he makes elaborate explanations over the 'phone, and she finally allows him to finish watching the New Year in with her. As he clasps her in his arms he gives thanks that he was shown in time that he who worships Beauty alone, builds his altar on the sands.

THE HONEYMOONERS (May 30).—May Phalen and Harry Nugent have just been married and in the midst of the reception after the ceremony, they decide to give their guests the slip and catch an earlier train for New York, so as to avoid the usual shower of rice and old shoes. They jump into an auto and race to the depot. On arrival there they find that their train is one hour late; Harry discovers that he has left their tickets at his home. May stays in the depot while he rushes home to get them. She gets into a remote corner, puts their suit case on the bench next to her, standing it up so that it hides her from view. She then reads, when Peter Crawford, a very portly, respectable looking man of about fifty, enters, and sits next to her on the other side of the suit case. May is very tired, and drops off to sleep, her head resting against the suit case. Shortly afterwards the portly gentleman goes to sleep; his head resting against the other side of the suit case. In the meantime the guests at the house discover that the couple have given them the slip. About six of his friends race to the depot in an auto. They look around, and finally find her asleep. Harry is nowhere to be found. On seeing the stout gentleman asleep they decide to have a little fun. They try various ways to annoy him by tickling his ear and nose, but cannot wake him up. They then draw the suit case out from between the two, so that her head rests on his shoulder. They also put an empty beer bottle in each one's arms and pin a sign on him which says, "I love my wife, but O! you kid." They then hide and wait for Harry. On seeing the couple Harry becomes frantic, and acts like a mad man. They both awaken and look around dazed. Thinking Harry is crazed, the man takes to his heels. Harry starts after him, but May pulls him back. He raves at her. She doesn't know what to think so begins to cry, when their friends come out and give them the laugh. Harry, realizing that it was a joke, takes May in his arms, while they all throw rice and old shoes at them.

RUBES EASTER AT ATLANTIC CITY (June 1).—Two rubes with their sweethearts decide to spend Easter holiday at Atlantic City. After indulging in the various amusements they start a flirtation with two summer girls, and decide to lose their sweethearts in order to obtain an opportunity with them. The girls, not liking their attire, tell them to change their clothes and meet them at 2 P. M. They do so. In the meantime, their sweethearts have discovered their loss, and, making a search for them, they find them dressed in very sporty clothes, wheeling a rolling chair with the two well-dressed girls in it. With eyes of envy they compare themselves and decide to buy clothes. They do so, and coming back to the boardwalk with veiled faces, they begin to flirt with their own sweethearts. The rubes fall into the snare and their feeling can be described better when their sweethearts remove their veils.

REVENGE (June 1).—Jack Carroll and Jenny Norton are sweethearts and live in Hankville. Old Man Norton does not approve of Jack visiting his daughter. One time he finds them together and drives Jack off the farm at the point of a shotgun. Jack tells his father that the girl's father theatened him with a gun. Old Man Carroll takes up his axe, and starts for the Norton house. Not finding Norton around he knocks on the door. Old Man Norton is upstairs and looks out of a window. Seeing who is banging on the door he throws a bucket of water on Old Man Carroll. In a few moments the two farmers are engaged in a rough and tumble fight. Jack sizes up the situation—runs and tells the girl that while the old men are fighting, it is their chance to slip away and get married. This is done and the two farmers are arrested by the constable. While taking them to the lock-up they are met on the road by the young couple. The men now see the humor of the situation and both forgive the children while the constable forgives the old men for fighting.

VITAGRAPH.

THE TRIUMPH OF RIGHT (May 27).—Leaving his consumptive wife with her child alone, and in poverty, Dave Dexter passes his time playing cards in the "Silver Star Saloon." His wife, seized with a choking cough, realizes that the end is at hand. She sends little Mary to the saloon for her father. She finds him in a dispute over cards. She steps between "Mexican Luke" and her father. Luke slinks back, ashamed by the child. The father returns to his cabin, realizes his wife's condition, and hastens out for help. The Mexican steals a cowboy's horse and rides toward Dexter's shack, seeking trouble, meeting Dexter going on his way for help. Dexter stops him and tells him of his wife's sickness and begs for the loan of his horse. The Mexican strikes Dexter with his whip. Driven to desperation, Dexter pulls the Mexican off his horse, mounts and rides away, leaving the Mexican swearing vengeance.

The cowboys miss the stolen horse and find the hat band from the Mexican's sombrero. They start after him. "Mexican Luke" visits the sheriff and accuses Dexter of being the long-sought horse-

"What Wesley Rosenquest Says Is True"

14th Street Theater, West 14th Street and 6th Avenue
New York City.

This is the universal comment of New York exhibitors who know Mr. Rosenquest. He has been affiliated with New York theatrical affairs for over twenty-five years, his critical analysis of theatrical improvements is severe, his business probity is unquestioned. In order that exhibitors outside of New York, who cannot communicate in person with Mr. Rosenquest, may get the benefit of the opinions of such a man in regard to the

NEW YORK, April 8, 1912.

Gentlemen: I had your perfection Concave Screen installed in my theater only after a very thorough investigation of its claims. I can truthfully say it has met my fullest expectations. It is a great improvement over my old curtain. Your curtain shows a brighter picture, without eye-strain, with equal light in all portions of the screen. It has eliminated the distorted condition of my old curtain and has "squared it off" beautifully. Another important feature is the satisfaction which patrons in the box seats now find, which means, of course, increased receipts. From a strictly business standpoint I believe its purchase to be one of the best investments any exhibitor could make. Respectfully, thief. The sheriff and he ride hastily to Dexter's home and find him bending over the dead body of his wife. The sheriff listens to the stricken man's story, but is forced to do his duty and he places the handcuffs on him. Little Mary pleads with the stern sheriff in vain. Tearfully the child produces her little bank and tries to bribe the sheriff, adding to the offer her last and dearest treasure, her old rag doll. Touched by Dexter's story, the presence of death and the appeal of the motherless child, he forgets he is sheriff, and forgetting his sworn oath of office, gives Dexter a chance to escape. He declines it. The sheriff is about to replace the handcuffs, when the cowboys, on the trail of the horse thief, crowd into the cabin. The sheriff silences them, telling them they are in the presence of death. With uncovered heads, the leader proves the innocence of Dexter by producing the missing hat-band and pointing to the Mexican's hat. "Mexican Luke" is led away by the sheriff and the cowboys, leaving Dexter and his little daughter alone with their dead.

J. WESLEY ROSENQUEST, Manager 14th Street Theater.

AN INNOCENT THEFT (May 28).—"Honesty is the best policy" is the lesson which little Malcom's mother taught him when he innocently committed a theft. Malcom's little heart aches for his mother when he sees her sick and penniless; he longs to do something to help her. He prays fervently that God may give him this opportunity. Sunday morning he goes out upon the street to beg; everybody ignores him. He passes a church and follows the people, who are entering. He is carried away with the grandeur and solemnity of the place, and when the warden is passing the collection plate, the little boy thinks when he sees the money on it that it is a direct answer to his prayer. Instead of contributing, he helps himself to a bright, shining silver piece. Overjoyed, he runs home to his mother.

When he tells her how he got it, she points out his mistake and tells him he has innocently committed a theft and makes him take the money back to the church, which he finds closed. He makes his way to the minister's house, returns the money and tells the good man all about it. The clergyman is deeply impressed. With his maid, he makes his way to Malcom's home, where he finds the mother ill and in need of care. He secures medical aid for her and procures a nurse, makes Malcom one of his choir boys and secures a position for him as bell boy in a large hotel.

ON HER WEDDING DAY (May 29).—Two fast friends, Donald Scott and Elbert Kenyon, are very much in love with the same girl, Ethel Morris. She becomes engaged to Donald, but finally decides to marry Elbert. Donald is deeply grieved, but acknowledges that his means would not permit him to support Ethel in the same style in which her father has kept her, and is glad that Elbert's wealth will enable her to enjoy much more happiness than he could possibly give her. At the wedding, Donald acts as best man.

On her way upstairs to put on her traveling suit, she picks from the floor the engagement ring which she had returned to Donald and which he had just dropped from his pocket. She looks at it. Donald, who is sitting meditatively near by, rises from his chair, and taking her hands in his, tells her how he loves her, embraces her and tries to kiss her. She tells him that she is married to Elbert and he is not acting the part of a gentleman to presume upon catching her unprotected and alone. She tries to resist him and in her efforts to do so, a large bouquet of violets which she wears in her corsage is crushed by Donald's violent embrace. At this moment Elbert comes into the hallway and, seeing her agitation, asks her the cause. She tries to explain. He looks at the crushed bouquet and the violet stains on Donald's shirt front, leaves her, going from the house to a hotel, refusing all overtures.

Donald finally calls upon Elbert, confesses his contemptible behavior and breach of friendship to him and his wife, and expressing the hope that Elbert will not hold Ethel guilty of any indiscretion, as he alone is guilty, and had urged the attentions, which she resisted. Elbert 'phones Ethel; tells her that he knows that she is innocent of any wrongdoing, and asks her to start at once on the honeymoon, which had been so ruthlessly interrupted by their false friend.

THE PICTURE IDOL (May 31).—"Isn't he lovely!" "One of the grandest men I ever saw," "perfectly exquisite," were the expressions to which Beth Ward, a young high school girl gave vent to whenever she thought or spoke of her "moving picture idol;" Howard Hanson, the player who takes the leading parts in the motion picture plays in her favorite productions. She unexpectedly sees him on the street and follows him until he disappears in his dwelling place, which she carefully notes by taking the number of the house. She sends him flowers and letters, much to his disgust, as this sort of recognition has become a pest to him. She and her friend, Pearl Shelby, are constant attendants at the theater where he appears in the films and they are both entranced. Beth is simply hypnotized. She becomes so violently carried away with her picture man, she falls behind in her studies. Her parents are notified by her teachers and soon learn of her insane infatuation. Her father calls on Howard and they arrange a plan to cure her of her foolishness. Howard dines with the Wards. Beth is enraptured until he exhibits such astounding table manners and insists upon bawling instead of singing; then she begins to see some defects in her idolized ideal.

In return, Howard asks the Wards to take tea with him the next day. He arranges with his roommate to impersonate his wife and employes several children from the neighborhood to represent his family. Mr. Ward and Beth call and she is so shocked by the coarseness and rudeness of his wife, and the terrible behavior and multiplicity of his children, she is glad to escape and is forever cured of her idolatry.

AN EVENTFUL ELOPEMENT (June 1).—Emphatically opposed to Jack Moss, old Mr. McGillicuddy puts the ban on his marriage to his daughter Dolly. The old gentleman is adamant to the appeals of the young lovers and interposes his interference on every occasion, when they get together. McGillicuddy is seized with an attack of the gout, which handicaps him, and it is then Jack arranges with Dolly to elope. She tells Jack to meet her at Mabel Wrights'. He agrees and they are married. Mabel Wright and Charley Fortune, inspired by the example of Jack and Dolly, decide to get married themselves.

Old Mr. McGillicuddy becomes suspicious and puts a detective on the track of his daughter, to prevent the consummation of Dolly's plans. The detective takes the scent, and through a false clue gets on the track of Mabel and Charley, whom he arrests with a great show of bravado and importance. He brings them before Mr. and Mrs. McGillicuddy, who are almost paralyzed with astonishment when they realize the sleuth's mistake, and that he has been foiled. The climax of this comedy of errors and love's victory is the appearances of Dolly and Jack upon the scene, firmly locked in the bonds of matrimony, which McGillicuddy cannot tear asunder. He accepts the situation gracefully by embracing his daughter and blessing the young couple.

MELIES.

MAKING GOOD (June 6).—Tom, a wayward son turned out of his home and gambling away his money, tries to pawn his jewelry in order to go West. He refuses to part with his mother's ring, given him on her death bed, without which he cannot raise enough, and so jumping a passing freight, hopes to reach his destination. Almost there, the train taking a sudden curve throws him off. Mary, the foreman's daughter, witnessing the accident, hurries to his aid; unable to lift him, she drags him to her home on a gate. After recovering Tom starts to work in the oil wells, and, infatuated with Mary, gives her his mother's ring. The foreman, returning to work, catches the engaged lovers and orders his daughter home. Tom offers to explain the situation, but her father refuses to listen. After a fistic battle the lover becomes unconscious, and, losing his balance, falls on the moving belt. Mary, rushing to his rescue, catches him just in time to save his life. Her father, finding out his mistake, apologizes and gives his consent to the marriage. A year later Tom writes home, saying that he has struck luck and made good at last.

BIOGRAPH.

A BEAST AT BAY (May 27).—A dangerous convict has escaped from prison and is skulking through the woods, pursued by prison officers. The officers separate and go in different directions in the hope of heading him off. This works well for the convict, who surprises one of the guards, and, overpowering him, makes him change clothes with him. About this time Edith is accompanying her sweetheart Jack to the railroad station in her auto and leaves in a huff, calling him a coward for not having entered into a street brawl with a drunken tramp, who insulted them on the way down. Jack has some time to wait before train time, and, upon looking after the departing auto, is surprised to see it held up by the disguised convict, who forces the girl to aid him in his escape. Two of the guards, arriving at the station, inform Jack of the true condition, and the three, knowing the railroad track to run parallel with the road, induce the train despatcher to let them have an engine to pursue the fugitive and the girl. Here follows the most thrilling pursuit ever witnessed—a race between an engine, a touring car, and a racing auto. Jack now has an opportunity to prove his mettle and takes advantage of it.

AN OUTCAST AMONG OUTCASTS (May 30).—A "Blanket Tramp" is he who carries with him a blanket to shield him, and for this he is frowned upon by the regular tramps and denied the society of that quasi-genteel fraternity, and so has to flock alone. Such is the condition of the hero of our story. In the course of his peregrinations, he passes the Post Office of a small village, and begs for "grub," which the daughter of the old postmaster hands out to him. For this he is grateful and has a chance later to render her a great service, for when the time comes to take the mail to the railroad station and get the incoming mail, the old postmaster is taken ill, and the daughter is obliged to go. The incoming mail contains a pouch of registered matter. Its arrival is witnessed by a couple of real tramps, who make up their minds to get it. This appears easy, when they see into whose custody it is given—the girl's. Their plan would have succeeded had not the "blanket tramp" happened along, who proved the hero of the day.

SELIG.

THE TREE OF KNOWLEDGE (May 27 .—The Watkins family consists of father, mother and son. The father is a railroad magnate and wizard of finance; the mother is an indulgent, capricious social butterfly, and the son is an unguarded plant left to grow wild in the soil of luxury. When the inevitable day of reckoning comes the boy, headstrong and defiant, rebels at his father's authority, and leaves home. From being a gay young spendthrift, he descends to the ladder of poverty. The parents are remorseful and unhappy because of their lost son. Accidentally Watkins, Sr., reads an account of a great scientist who, wearied with the emptiness of wealth, went out to study and labor among the poor. The idea fascinates him and he decides to emulate the scientist's example. Disguised as a common laborer Watkins, Sr., rubs elbows with the forlorn, weary, down-and-out wrecks of life. Among them, eventually, he finds his son, who, hopeless and desperate, has determined to end it all. A reconciliation takes place, and the boy, having tasted the bitter dregs of the cup of folly, decides to make a man of himself. Each has learned the great lesson of life, and are the better for it, and the two turn homeward together.

A RECONSTRUCTED REBEL (May 30).—Colonel Yancey, C. S. A., his cause lost, rather than surrender his sword, abandons his plantation, takes with him his little girl and the flag he could not save from defeat, and, still wearing his uniform of gray; goes to Honduras. Here the Stars and Bars fly defiantly over Colonel Yancey's house. Louise grows to a beautiful young womanhood, and the old Colonel dreams, bitterly but proudly of the past.

Colonel Winston, U. S. A., got into such a habit of wearing his blue uniform during four hard years that he never abandoned it. When appointed Consul of the United States at Tegucigalpa, he secretly thought that it would add no little to his dignity, and so it came about that one day a Union and a Confederate Colonel in full uniform met upon the street, stared, and glared, while from nearby poles floated the Stars and Stripes and the St. Andrew's Cross.

Dick Winston, who served as clerk in the Consulate, thought the warlike attitudes assumed by the old gentlemen very amusing, until he met Louise; then he saw that this left-over bit of the spirit of the 60s was apt to prove a serious matter.

An anti-American outbreak occurs. In attempting to protect an American citizen who is being hunted down, Colonel Winston incurs the anger of the mob, and Colonel Yancey sees the Consul, with the Flag in his hand, go down beneath the blows of the natives, while the Flag is trampled contemptuously in the dust. A little family quarrel is one thing; insult to the Flag that flew at Yorktown and Monterey is quite another—in a moment the old Confederate revolvers are blazing, and the Colonel has lost none of his skill. The natives draw back. Dick Winston arrives upon the scene, and Colonel Yancey assists him to drag the Consul toward the shelter of the Yancey house, the nearest refuge. The mob intercepts them, and they retreat to a point of vantage, just where is planted the pole from which floats the Stars and Bars. A rioter appears from Colonel Yancey's house, dragging Louise. Dick rescues her and brings her to the little fort. The Consul has recovered sufficiently to use his revolver, and they are able to hold off the mob for a short time. Just as the natives gather for a final rush, a detachment of U. S. Marines appear, coming on the run, with fixed bayonets, and the mob breaks and flies. The Marine Officer stares in amazement at the Confederate Flag, then gives an order, and the Marines present arms. Colonel Yancey returns the salute with military precision, then turns and slowly lowers the flag, clasping the outstretched hand of the Consul, as he does so. Dick has run and brought the American Flag left in the street, and he and Louise quickly attach it to the lanyards and run it to the tŏp of the staff.

THE PART OF HER LIFE (May 31).—At Mrs. Slaytor's dramatic agency the blackboard shows that a leading lady for a comedy is wanted who can act a drunken scene with a hysterical laugh. There are no offers to take the part, and Mrs. Slayter is in despair. Then Jane Doe enters and is induced to accept the part. She looks for a quiet place in which to study and practice the part, but only attracts the attention of some rude boys on the outskirts of the town. Still seeking quiet she goes on to the woods, where a tramp is convinced she is crazy. Seeing the boys following her, she goes back to her room. Here her efforts to get up in her part attract a crowd, the janitor, and a policeman. She falls asleep on her chair, and dreams that she gets into a safe, where she will surely find the necessary quiet. A burglar however, blows open the safe. Then Jane takes to the jungle and the cannibals put her in a pot. Finally, she finds herself falling through the air, and awakes on the floor. She decides to give it up and get a good rest.

THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS NO. 5—They Go to School (May 31).—Another laughable Katzenjammer comedy. Hans and Fritz dislike school and their attempts to dodge an education furnish one long, hearty laugh.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 21—1912 (May 20).—New York, N. Y.—Eight thousand Suffragists, under the leadership of Grand Marshal Mrs. A. C. Hughston, parade through the city.

Melbourne, Australia—The strike of the street railway employees, in their fight for permission to wear the Union button, assumes grave proportions.

Coovaller, Ore.—The cadets of the Oregon Agricultural College are reviewed by the business men of the state.

Belfast, Ireland—Bonar Law, M. P., speaking to 100,000 Loyalists on Balmoral Field, pledges himself to "fight Home Rule for Ireland to the end."

Pawhuska, Okla.—A cyclone sweeps from Mississippi through this section of Oklahoma, killing 18 people and injuring many more.

Alicante, Spain—The Spanish Sovereigns visit the city and call on the Mayor at the City Hall.

New York, N. Y.—The Evening Mail Modified Marathon Race, from 184th Street to the City Hall, is won by Louis Scott of the Paterson Athletic Club, in 1 hour, 8 minutes, 28 2-5 seconds.

London, England—Sir Francis Howard reviews a detachment of English troops quartered in his shire.

Camden, N. J.—The Chinese protected cruiser, Fei Hung, designed as a training ship for officers and men of the Chinese Navy, is successfully launched at the New York Shipbuilding Company's Yards.

Paris, France—The advance styles in Summer millinery show wide diversity in size and trimming.

JUSTICE OF MANITOU (May 16).—In the absence of a brave, the squaw is attacked by three white men. She finally succeeds in beating them off. Later, on hearing her story, the brave follows the three men and fights them against such odds he can only lose and is killed. His dead body is discovered by his squaw, who calls upon the sheriff of the county to avenge her dead. The posse catches the three men, but on hearing their story of the fight lets them go. The Indian squaw finds two braves who befriend her in her hour of need, and seeking out the men, wreak their vengeance on her foes.

FOR THE HONOR OF THE NAME (May 29).—Before our story opens two sisters had been in love with the same man and in the first scene we find the young sister poverty stricken and alone, desperately ill. She writes to her sister for succor and is taken to their beautiful home in the country where she recovers her health. Two years pass and one day the younger sister, finding the wife keeping a rendezvous with a friend and learning that her brother in law knows of it, hurries to the place of meeting and takes her sister's place with intensely dramatic results.

THE LEADING LADY'S BABY (May 30).—Kitty Lightfoot appears at the hotel in the town in which she is about to play, accompanied by her maid and her poodle dog. Unfortunately for the poodle, the hotel does not accommodate him and rather than be deprived of her dear dog, Kitty Lightfoot hits upon a scheme. Hastening to the nearest baby haberdasher she buys the necessary outfit and on a bench in the park dresses the poodle dog in the baby's haberdashery and returns to the hotel. The soft warm bundle in her arms passes muster with the new clerk who comes on duty and everything goes as smoothly as a marriage bell until the poodle lamps the hotel cat and in one-half a second the poodle dog is in full cry with puss cat in the lead by 2 feet 4 inches. Puss cat hikes for the dining room, which she goes through with the poodle dog at her heels. Next the kitchen, then the corridor, finally the front hall, then the lobby where the clerk is so scared he falls over the waste basket and cracks his shin against the safe. The poodle dog's race is rudely interrupted by the strong arm of the law in the shape of a policeman who has come in on hearing the noise, and finally Fido and the leading lady are ignominiously thrust into jail.

WHIRLWIND COURTSHIP ON BRADON'S RANCH (June 1).—Nell's brother returns from college and brings Jack along with him. Nell's father hates Jack with a hatred than which there is none greater, and Jack is promptly kicked off the ranch. Hieing him hence to a costumers, the versatile Jack dons a woman's outfit and eventually returns to the ranch, armed with a forged letter, as Miss Gladys Smith, the new school marm, who desires to arrange for board. Here she wins the affection of Broncho Bill, the hoped for son-in-law of Col. Bradon, and having metaphorically and literally placed the cowboy on his knees before her, she manages to bring the Colonel on the scene with the result that Broncho Bill is promptly kicked off the ranch also. These hasty removals greatly irritating the colonel, he retires to the solitude of his kitchen, where he receives a note from his dutiful daughter telling him that unless he beats her to the Justice of the Peace she shall be married to Jack—and he can't beat her.

C. G. P. C.

THE MUSKETEER'S DUEL (May 28).—A cavalier in love with the charming daughter of a noble Frenchman is interrupted in his love-making by the advent of a musketeer quartered at the chateau. The latter makes violent love to the young lady in spite of the cavalier's protest, and finally a duel ensues, in which the cavalier is apparently killed. The musketeer returns to the chateau to apprise himself of the cavalier's fate, and upon his entrance who should he see seated in a chair before the fire, but his friendly enemy, the cavalier, who was not wounded at all, but had played this trick on his adversary.

HIS WIFE'S WHIMS (May 31).—Mr. Snuders has noticed some rather peculiar actions on the part of his better-half, and fearing that she is about to become a suffragette he visits the family physician, who informs him that he must put up with all the little idiosyncrasies shown by Mrs. Snuders, no matter what they might be, because the Snuder family will in time be increased by another Snuder. Greatly elated Snuder follows Mrs. Snuder as she goes to try on a new gown at the dressmaker's. On the way she languidly lifts a bunch of grapes from the cart of a passing vender and eats them with eagerness. Mr. Snuder pays the angry vender and whispers in his ear the remarkable luck he is in. However, Mrs. Snuder, when she leaves her costume on the chair at the dressmaker's, while she tries on a new gown, is robbed of her coat, dress, veil and umbrella by a thief who is pursued by the police. This member of the Lightfinger Brigade dons the outfit, proceeds down the street post haste and Mr. Snuder wearing a bland smile follows closely at his heels. Everywhere the thief goes he manages to steal something for which Mr. Snuder graciously pays, until finally the strain becomes too great, and the suspicious police arrest the whole outfit and everything is ultimately explained.

RELIANCE.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S CONSCIENCE (May 22).—James Douglas, a rising young lawyer of reputation, is elected to the office of District Attorney. At his election he also announces his engagement to Phyllis Hathaway. After their marriage his first big case is that of a man arrested for murder. He sees a great opportunity to make a name for himself, and throws his whole soul into sending the man to the electric chair. His wife begs him not to convict on circumstantial evidence, but he laughs at her fears. The end of the trial draws near and his wife attends the "summing up." While the jurors are out she discovers the prisoner's litle boy and acts as his protector. Realizing the verdict will be "guilty," she takes the boy out of the room.

When Douglas comes home flushed with his triumph she again pleads with him against conviction on circumstantial evidence. Her pleas and the boy present in his home shake his confidence, but he passes it off and agrees to allow her to adopt the boy. Later when his enthusiasm grows cold he begins to doubt the man's guilt. He reads of the convict's death in the chair, still maintaining his innocence and his fear grows. Douglas sobs out his mental anguish to the prisoner's attorney who half-heartedly tries to console him with the statement that he personally is positive of the prisoner's guilt. Going home he finds his wife and the boy. The former almost shrinks from him, so sure is she that her husband has sent an innocent man to his death. In desperation he sends for the prisoner's counsel, and tells him of his doubt, willingness to resign office, and make all possible restitution. The lawyer pulls from his pocket the prisoner's last confession: that he was guilty of the crime.

FATHER BEAUCLAIRE (May 25).—A young murderer, Jacques Delur, after depositing the body of his victim, a young girl, on the bed in one of the rooms of the rectory, goes to Father Beauclaire and confesses. While he is on his knees confessing his crime, he sticks a dagger in the cowl of the priest's garb. After having received absolution, he retires from the room, and on reaching the exterior of the rectory, calls two gendarmes, to whom he hastily explains that a murder has been committed. Jacques accuses the priest of the murder, giving as evidence the bloody dagger in the cowl of the priest's garb, and leading the gendarmes and the priest to the room where the body of the dead girl lay.

The priest is tried and sentenced to death, is excommunicated, and rather than betray the confessional, goes to his death on the guillotine. A year later, in a dilapidated house, Jacques is found surrounded only by the empty brandy and absinthe bottles, and a French woman with him, whom he has requested to send for a priest, so that on his death bed he may confess the crime for which an innocent man went to his death. The priest comes, receives his confession, and gives him absolution and the murderer dies.

THANHOUSER.

JESS (Part One) (May 21).—Silas Croft was a kindly old Englishman who had a farm in South Africa. With him resided his two nieces, whom he had taken from their drunken, worthless father when they were of a tender age. Jess, the elder, was brilliant and educated; Bess, the younger, was beautiful, but frankly admitted that she did not possess the mental attainments of Jess. The two were great friends, and Jess, although the senior by only three years, had almost a motherly affection for her pretty little sister.

Croft, finding old age stealing upon him, advertised for a partner, stipulating that he must be a gentleman. Probably it was his secret idea that the right man might come along, and fall in love with his favorite, beautiful Bessie.

Captain John Neil, an English army officer, who had found his income insufficient to support him in his profession, heard of the business opportunity and accepted it. Jess, the unimpressionable, speedily fell in love with him, and her womanly intuition told her that she could win him, for he was fascinated by her. The girl was happy for awhile, but suddenly learned that her little sister was also in love with the handsome Englishman.

The elder sister realized that happiness for her, meant sorrow, probably life-long sorrow, for Bess. Accustomed to making sacrifices for the girl she so tenderly loved, Jess made another. On the pretext of a visit to an old school friend, she absented herself from home, knowing that Neil would be bound to fall in love with Bess, who was beautiful and amiable.

JESS (Part Two) (May 28).—The expected happened. At the time Jess departed, Neil liked both girls, but preferred Jess. Thrown into daily companionship with Bess, he soon grew to love her, and made her happy by proposing to her. And little sister wrote to big sister, telling her the glorious news, never even suspecting the truth.

Jess received the letter in her place of refuge, and rejoiced that she had been able to ensure the happiness of Bess, while at the same time she wept in secret over the fate that had taken all romance out of her young life.

The two nieces of Silas Croft, an Englishman, who has an estate in South Africa, are in love with their uncle's partner, Capt. John Neil, a retired army officer. Jess, the elder, realizes that her sister's affections are centered on Neil, and makes a pretext to leave the farm, believing that by so doing she will ensure the happiness of little sister Bess. Matters turn out as she had anticipated, and in her distant home Jess, with mingled feelings of joy and sorrow, receives news of the engagement.

At this time, the rebellion which freed the Transvaal from British rule was brewing. Croft, who at first doubted that any trouble was impending, at last realizes the gravity of the situation, and Neil consents to go to Pretoria and bring Jess home before it is too late. The gallant soldier arrives in the city, but is unable to leave with his charge, because the Boers have besieged the place, and even couriers cannot pierce the lines.

A certain Frank Muller, son of a Boer and an Englishwoman, is one of the leaders in the revolt. He had proposed to Bess and been rejected. Learning that his successful rival is in Pretoria, he plans to dispose of him. Pretending great friendliness, he sends Neil a pass for Jess and himself, signed by Oom Paul Kruger. The unsuspecting Englishman falls into the trap, and with the girl, leaves under the charge of a Boer escort, furnished by Muller.

These men have been tricked into believing that Kruger has ordered that the couple be killed, and while they are crossing a river, fire upon them and believe they are slain. Jess and Neil, however, have a miraculous escape.

JESS (Part Three) (May 28).—Following the crossing of the river under fire, on their way to Pretoria, Jess and Neil become separated, and the girl reaches the farm alone. There she finds that the villain Muller has been ahead of her, and that her uncle is a prisoner, on a charge of treason. Muller, who is military head of the district, tells Bess that Croft will be convicted and hanged unless Bess consents to marry him. The girl, however, refuses, the court-martial is held, and when Jess arrives, her uncle is under sentence to die at dawn, a few hours away.

There is no one to whom she can appeal, and Jess, grief-stricken, decides to be her own avenger. Muller is asleep in his tent, waiting for the dawn when the last of the protectors of the girl he covets shall be separated from her by death. He awakes with a start. Bending over him is Jess. He believes it is a visitor from another world, for he could have sworn that he had seen her die a horrible death. Stricken with terror, unable to speak or make a motion, he goes to his death, his last thought being that there is a life beyond the grave, and that evil brings its own punishment.

Jess wanders away into the desert and dies. Neil, searching, finds the body. The troubles of the others are finally swept away, and Neil and Bess live happily many years in their English home, never realizing that they owe everything to the self-sacrificing Jess, although they sincerely mourn and miss her.

WHOM GOD HATH JOINED (May 31).—A young mechanic, temporarily residing in a Southern city, found that business was slack in his trade, and decided to send his wife to her relations in the North until happier days dawned. He did not dream that he was putting her in peril, and when later he received word that the ship upon which she sailed had been lost with all on board, he was frantic with grief and self reproach. Life in this city became hateful to him, and having no ties that bound him there, he abruptly departed into the country, deciding to wander wherever fate might lead him.

He found, that after a period of sorrow and suffering, his lines were cast in pleasant paths, for he met a kindly old farmer, who offered him a job, and soon grew to absolutely trust him. His employer had a daughter, and as time passed on, the girl showed him favor, while the farmer made it manifest that he would only be too glad to trust the future of his child in the hands of one who but a short time before had been a stranger.

The young man did not love the girl as he had loved his wife; but he was very fond of her, had almost a filial affection for her father, and gradually, as time dulled his anguish, he became convinced that his happiness depended upon a second marriage. So he proposed, was accepted, and the course of true love seemed to be running very smoothly.

In the meantime, the wife was slowly regaining her strength. She had not met death in the wreck, but was the one survivor, having been found nearly dead, by some fishermen, who had discovered the broken fragments of the ship. When able to sit up, her memory was gone, and it was not until many weary months had passed, that she was able to remember who she was, and what had happened. By this time the husband had vanished, and the poor, weak woman found it impossible to trace him. She kept up the search, however, and finally, by chance, located him, reading in a paper of his approaching marriage.

The wife reached the house on the day set for the ceremony. There she met her rival, arrayed in her wedding gown, and told her who she was. The untutored country girl, in her first moment of anguish, denied that the man of her choice was the husband of the other woman, and fiercely ordered her away. In terror of her life, the wife departed, and the country girl followed her to the porch of the house, and grimly watched her as she staggered off. She saw her attempt to cross the railroad tracks, slip and fall, striking her head on the tracks and lying there unconscious. The same moment the watcher heard the whistle of the approaching train, and knew that if she refused to aid, that the obstacle that might prevent her marriage to the man she loved would be removed.

First she watched her grimly, determined that she should die. The train was coming on rapidly, but the woman's thoughts traveled far more swiftly. She hated her rival bitterly, but she could not let her die. In the end she dragged her from the tracks, restored her to her husband, and tearfully watched the couple as they departed from her life, happy after their long period of suffering.

The girl remained at the farmhouse, and during the long, lonely years that followed, she frequently wondered whether she had done right in sacrificing her happiness. "Is love worth a crime?" she mused, and somehow she could never answer the question to her own satisfaction.

THE THIRST FOR GOLD (May 27).—John Brown leaves his home in the East to seek his fortune in the gold mines of the far West. For fifteen years he struggles against fate—the riches he has sought so long and arduously, does not come to him. After this, his last desperate effort, he has decided that if still unsuccessful, he will return to his eastern home. He fails to find the precious metal and his provisions being out and his supply of water almost gone, he breaks camp and starts across the desert to the nearest settlement.

He loses his way and for several days wanders aimlessly. In the distance he sees a figure approaching; when they meet he discovers it is a young man, a prospector like himself, without pack or water bottle, also that he is out of his head, presumably from thirst. He seizes John's water bag and there is a terrific struggle. He is finally overpowered. The stranger offers nuggests from a rich strike he has just made, for a drink of water. John refuses for there is only a few drops of the liquid remaining. The young man pleads for his mother's sake, and John is again about to refuse, when he sees a vision of his own mother as he last saw her fifteen years ago, and he tenders his bottle. Together they start out on the long journey through the desert.

They are suffering greatly and are almost exhausted when far away John sees a railroad train. Knowing there must be water in that direction they strain every effort to reach the distant spot. The stranger is exhausted and John almost so from carrying him. At last the goal is reached—here is a water tank—John pulls the rope releasing the water, and both men fall into it.

The younger man thinking he will die gives John a paper showing the location of the mine, which he was crossing the desert to have filed, and offers it to him, if he will promise to take care of his mother, a photograph of whom he also shows to John. In this pictured face, to his intense amazement, he recognizes his own mother. And the young prospector is his brother, Walter, whom he left at home a small boy. The shock of finding a brother revives Walter, and they then make their way to town and file the claim. Then home to mother and luxury.

THE PERIL (May 30).—Hokoruma, a Japanese soldier, is sent to San Francisco, to obtain at all hazards a plan of the new harbor fortifications about to be erected. He registers at a Japanese employment bureau and, through this means, secures a position of butler in the home of the Commanding General, Colonel Jones. This gives him the opportunity of learning and seeing much that is necessary for him to know in accomplishing his end.

The Colonel's daughter, Clara, is engaged to Lieut. Pond, and the marriage is dated for the near future. At the Officers' Club, Lieut. Pond is guilty of an act unbecoming to a gentleman, and the Colonel, who is severe but just, offers him the choice of two alternatives—court-martial, or resignation. The Lieutenant is overwhelmed with the threatened disgrace. But, he thinks he sees a means of escape—he will persuade his fiance to elope with him—the Colonel would never carry out the proceedings against his son-in-law.

He enters Clara's home secretly and, while waiting in a dark room, while she is preparing to join him, a man stealthily creeps in and endeavors to make away with some important papers, which are kept in a secret drawer. Recovering from the surprise the Lieutenant springs on the intruder and there is a terrific struggle, at the height of which Clara enters the room. She is horrified to see her lover in the clutches of a supposed burglar, and immediately arouses the household. Her parents appear, and the spy succumbs to the vigorous blows inflicted by his opponent. When the lights are turned on, it is revealed that the would-be-robber is none other than Hokoruma, the butler.

Lieut. Pond is, of course, fully forgiven by the Colonel, who is saved from disgrace by the courage displaced by the man whom he was to court-martial, and to whom he now willingly and gladly gives his daughter

UP AGAINST IT (June 1).—Amos Bentley was up against it in more senses than one. Times were so hard with him that he had to part with the furniture of his little apartment in order to pay his debts. However, things were inclined to take a better turn for him.

He was invited to be a guest of some friends of his. And between him and the daughter of the family some sort of heart interest was supposed to exist. Disinclined to accept the invitation at first, he yielded to the persuasions of his friend, the brother of the girl, and made his way to the host's house. Unfortunately his nether garment gave way in a somewhat conspicuous place and in his attempts to conceal the tear while the evening party was in progress, poor Amos suffered a great deal of torture

Finally, he was shown into the room of his probable fiance. And while in the act of searching for a needle and thread, was discovered by her father, who had not yet made the acquaintance of Amos.

Poor Amos stood in imminent danger from an ugly looking revolver which Mr. Crampton pointed at him. However, his peril was discovered in time by the girl and her brother, and the lady lending him a convenient dressing gown, proceeded to help him out of his sartorial difficulty, and at the same time intimated to him that she would not be disinclined to darn socks for an indefinite period. So the young couple was made happy.

THE ART OF SILVER PLATE MAKING (June 1).—The art of silver plate making as illustrated in this film is the result of a special concession given to the Imp Films Company by one of the most eminent firms in the world, Sheffield Plate Co., of New York City. We see the fashioning of the metal into various articles for table and decorative uses, and the mechanical appliances of a first-class silver plate making factory in actual operation.

REPUBLIC.

THE SOLDIER'S LAST CALL (May 28).—Two old veterans, one a Yank, the other a Rebel, both inmates of the country poor house, have been cronies for years. The Yank always carries his old bugle while the Southern veteran is never without his sword, which he uses as a cane. Both old men live close to the Military Academy, which they often visit and in which they soon become great favorites.

They are both present when the funeral of a soldier takes place, and in a spirit of mischief the Yank tells the Southerner, that no military honors will be accorded him when he dies as there are no rebeles left. This preys upon the old man's mind until he finally writes a letter to the commander of the Academy, begging him to give him a military funeral when he dies, as he has no kith or kin nor a Southern Army to do this for him. When the letter is read at the barracks there is not a dry eye among the hundreds of cadets who unanimously vote that the old Southern soldier be notified that full military honors will be accorded him at his funeral, though they are in hopes he will be spared to them for many years.

Sham battles are quite often indulged in by the cadets, and one day while one of these battles are going on the old Southerner is awakened from a dream of by-gone days by the rattle of firearms and cannons. His half awakened condition makes him think he is back on the firing lines among his old soldiers. Forgetting his weakness and old age and filled with a spirit of patriotism, he dashes towards the scene of battle just as one side is retreating. He swings his old sword over his head and cries to the boys to "charge," and leads them against the opposing side. The boys, thinking the old man is joining their sham battle, cheer and follow him—but alas, his poor old heart has been over taxed, and as he climbs on the breastworks he totters and falls, and the spirit of the old rebel goes to its rest.

The soldiers of the Academy bury him with military honors. After the last volley has been fired and the academy bugler is about to sound taps, his old Yankee crony with the old bugle under his arm begs permission of the captain to let the music of his old bugle perform this service. As the last note dies away the old Yank falls across the grave of his friend and the two souls are joined never to battle or part again.

THE OTHER MAN (June 1).—Norman O'Neill and George Fitzhugh are in love with Nora Danver. George proposes to Nora and is informed that she is going to marry Norman. George encounters a man and a woman, and believes he recognizes Norman He immediately returns and informs Nora of this She disbelieves him, but nevertheless is persuaded to accompany him. Nora, believing her fiance faithless, decides to break the engagement.

In the meantime the man and woman come to the entrance of the Danver's estate. The man leaves the woman and enters the grounds. Nora's father is asleep in his armchair in the library and is awakened He finds an intruder searching his desk. The intruder overpowers him and, in the struggle, the father believes he recognizes Norman.

Nora meets Norman on the lawn and informs him that she saw him with another woman and that she has reason to believe him faithless, and will listen to no explanations.

Nora's father, who has been injured by the intruder, staggers from the house. Norman and Nora come to his assistance, and the father tells of the robbery and accuses Norman of the theft. Norman, dazed at the accusation and realizing that things look black for him and that even Nora believes him guilty, decides to escape. The soldiers are informed and sent in search of Norman. They come across a man whom they believe to be Norman, but he eludes them. The escaping man is finally shot by the pursuing soldiers, but takes refuge in a tunnel. There he encounters a man and a struggle ensues. After the struggle one man is lying on the ground and the other whom he recognizes as Norman runs from the scene, as the soldiers approach. The man is raised from the ground. George accuses him of the theft, calling him Norman's name. The man informs them that he is not Norman and, realizing that he is near death, confesses that he is the one who is guilty. George sees the remarkable resemblance between the man and Norman, and later when he comes across Norman, he tells him of the mistake and of his double's confession.

AMERICAN.

THE WANDERING GYPSY (May 23).—Bill Reese, surly, brutal and generally worthless, lives with his pretty cousin Betty and her aged grandfather. He abuses the old man often and Betty grew to despise him. One day a wandering gypsy, dying of thirst in the desert, staggered to Betty's door. She fed her and gave her something to drink. The old gypsy felt grateful toward the girl and told her fortune. Bill Reese, staggering drunkenly from the cabin, saw the gypsy woman, and with blows and curses drove her from the premises.

In the desert, the gypsy stopped to rest beside a giant cactus. Bob Wentworth, idly resting but a short distance off, to amuse himself, drew his gun and shot holes into the cactus. Hearing the gypsy scream, he rushed to her. A drink of water revived the Nomad, and, taking him by the hand, told him there was work to do. Bob followed her and soon they came to the little cabin.

The sight startled them. Bill Reese was kicking the aged grandfather, who reeled beneath a load of shovels. Betty was protesting to Bill, who, in a fit of anger, slapped her. The next instant, Bob Wentworth had knocked him down and from that moment a deadly enmity grew between them.

In the weeks that followed, Bob and Betty saw much of each other. Love sprang up and the young couple often took long walks in the lonely paths of the mountains. Bill Reese, seeing that Betty grew to hate him more and more in proportion as she loved this handsome stranger, fell into the habit of following them, in the hope of getting a shot at Bob.

One day his chance came. Patiently he stood in the shadow of a boulder, watching the couple wrapped in each other's arms some distance off. He drew his gun and sighted carefully. Meantime, high up above him the old gypsy woman stopped, transfixed. Only an instant did she hesitate. Loosening a giant boulder from the mountain side, she started it on its downward path. There was a terrific crashing of trees, other boulders were loosened, and, when the couple reached the scene, only the mangled feet of Reese could be seen. Looking up they saw the gypsy woman smiling and throwing kisses from her lofty perch.

FEATHER TOP (May 28).—Old Mother Rigby, the village witch of a quaint New England settlement in colonial days, makes for herself a scarecrow, to protect her garden. She is so pleased with her work that she brings it to life, by making it smoke her magic pipe, telling the newly created man (whom she names "Lord Feathertop"), that as long as he breathes the tobacco smoke he will remain handsome and living. She sends the fine new gentleman to woo the Squire's daughter. At the wedding feast the girl learns the real nature of her suitor, by seeing his reflection in a mirror of truth. Lord Feathertop is really in love and he has seen for himself that he is only a "contraption" of ragged old clothes with sticks for legs and pumpkin for a head. He rushes home to the witch's house and declares that he cannot live without love. Breaking the pipe which has kept him alive, the magic ended, he falls to the floor as a scarecrow. The witch philosophically plants him in her garden, declaring that he will do more work for a scarecrow than most of his living brothers.

MARRIED WITHOUT KNOWING IT (May 26).—Jacqueline has two lovers: Cabochard and Finot. She loves Finot and declares she will not marry Cabochard, whom her father has, however, decided she should marry. Jacqueline, despairing, implores the aid of her mother, who also favors Finot. She promises to help her daughter, but as she cannot give her opinion openly, she will think of some plan. An ingenious woman friend of hers associates with her in planning the trick which will make the father change his mind. Jacqueline pretends to receive Cabochard with more courtesy. One day while the happy lover is with her, a woman comes in followed by nine children and carrying two in her arms. She rushes to Cabochard, accuses him of having abandoned her with all her children, and upbraids him for his intention to marry. The lover, stupefied, tries in vain to explain. The betrothed and her mother pretend to be very angry, while the children cling to Cabochard. The father arrives, puts Cabochard out and consents to receive Finot as a husband for his daughter.

TYPES OF THE CAUCASUS (May 26).—This is a splendid educational film, showing scenes in a little-traveled land. Timber merchants, Circassions, Persians and Bohemian Muscovites are among the many characters caught by the camera.

THE BEAUTY SPOTS (May 23).—The son of wealthy, aristocratic parents falls in love with the daughter of a self-made man. The girl pricks her face with a thorn from some roses and the youth puts a tiny piece of court plaster on the spot, which has the effect of a fascinating beauty spot. The youth proposes, asks the father for the girl's hand, and is informed that she can only marry a man who works. The youth answers several advertisements for help, but is not taken seriously. He has a fantastic dream of his sweetheart and myriads of beauty spots and conceives the notion of making beauty spots fashionable and going into business. He gets into all kinds of scrapes promoting the fashion, but finally succeeds and is taken into partnership with Dr. Grump's Toilet Specialties. With his partnership papers explanations are made to his sweetheart and her father, and he is forgiven and accepted. In the finale the colored maid appears, also in fashion, with a white beauty spot on her black face.

THE POWER OF MELODY (May 20).—Albert Earle, a talented musician, lives in a small rented apartment. He is out of work; his bills are due and, having pawned everything of value, he is utterly discouraged. Janet, his wife, implores him to take his latest composition to the publishers, but Earle, knowing the futility of such visits, refuses. His little daughter's illness, however, compels him to take his song to the office of Henry Biglow, who roughly turns him down without a hearing. On his way home, Earle buys a paper and eargerly searches the "Help Wanted Column," while Janet prepares the simple meal. Seeing an advertisement for an orchestra leader in a cafe, and without waiting to eat his supper, he hurries out and procures the position.

The Biglows' only daughter, Georgia, is somewhere in the city, preferring cafes and music halls and the company of fast men and women to the home of her parents. The parents' efforts have been unsuccessful in their attempts to bring the wanderer home.

On the night of the violinist's engagement, Georgia Biglow with Fred, Bob and Florence, her companions, visit the cafe. While they are drinking and making merry, Earle plays the song which had been rejected. It touches the heart of Georgia as she listens. The plaintive melody recalls her parents and home, and makes her realize the kind of life she is leading. When the music is ended there are tears in her eyes.

The following night Georgia comes to the cafe with her friends, hoping to again hear the song that had such a strange effect on her. Earle softly plays it, and the struggle begins. Will she give up the life that holds such evil fascination for her? Will she return to father and mother? Can they forgive her and take her to their arms once more? She cries and sobs when the music ceases. Earle, who had been playing the song directly to her, suspecting its power, rushes to her side. She has made up her mind to go home, knowing that she will be welcomed and forgiven if under the power of that music. She tells Earle so and he escorts her home. There on the porch at midnight, she tells him to play, as he never has played it before. He does so. Biglow and his wife hear the sweet strains of the violin. What does it mean? It brings sad recollections of their wayward child. They rush to the door, there to see the erring one waiting with outstretched arms. She is quickly taken to their arms and all is forgiven.

HOW THE RANGER WAS CURED (May 22).—James Morgan is a patent medicine fiend. Whenever his wife, their little girl, his cowboys or himself are sick or even ailing, James insists upon them taking all sorts of patent medicines, and, as a consequence, everyone becomes worse after the doses. The only one who absolutely refuses to take his patent medicine is the foreman, Tom Merrill, for he claims that when he wants to drink whiskey, he will take it pure. Alcohol in any form, however, is prohibited on the Morgan ranch, and the foreman cures the boys of the harmful patent medicine habit by showing them the Pure Food Law label on the bottles, which proclaimed that 65 per cent. of the compound was alcohol.

On this particular day, Morgan sends away the doctor from his sick child, quarrels with the foreman in regard to a new brand of medicine he had bought; insists upon his wife taking a dose and takes a goodly amount himself. He lays down to sleep and Morpheus takes a hand. After a horrible nightmare, in which James kills two men by forcing them to drink entire bottles of his favorite brand of patent medicine, P-Dope-A, is pursued, and finally caught by the sheriff and his posse, and the doctor is shoving a great big gun down his throat, James awakes to find the medico forcing him to drink some medicine in order to restore him to consciousness. The vivid impression that his wild dreams have made upon him, or rather his attack of delirium tremens, caused by freely imbibing P-Dope-A, make James declare, then and there, that never again would he touch patent medicine. As a result, in a few months, not only himself, but his wife and child, are restored to health and happiness.

SANTA MONICA ROAD RACE (May 25).—This free-for-all automobile race smashed all world's previous records. Teddy Tetzlaff, in "Owensmouth Baby" Fiat, came in first; time 3:50:57; average 78.71 miles an hour, making new world's record. Caleb Bragg, the young Pasadena millionaire, in Fiat, came in second; time 3:54:65, and David Bruce-Brown, winner of the Savannah free-for-all, came in third, in his Benz car; time 3:56:32.

This was the greatest race ever run on the Santa Monica course, also the cleanest, for this race, which may be said to have marked the supremacy of the sport in all respects, had scarcely an accident, for all the tremendous and grim toying with death. Very thrilling it was, as the automobiles flew along the Nevada turn, which is known as Death's Curve. One man was rendered unconscious by a piece of tire from the big, red Fiat, which Barney Oldfield was driving. Bad luck still pursues Barney Oldfield, for he suffered more from accidents to his car than any other pilot.

To Bruce-Brown, who came in third, fell the honor of reeling off the fastest lap of the day, 5 minutes, 27.25 seconds. He was unable to assume the lead, however, as he was forced to the pits for tires and Tetzlaff, in his 90 horse-power Fiat, went on his championship way.

OIL FIELDS, CALIFORNIA (May 25).—A succession of highly interesting and instructive pictures, showing the famed oil fields of Bakersfield, Cal.; the Kern River, a gusher, the building of a reservoir with a capacity of one million barrels, the pumping of water with compressed air to prevent inundation of oil strata, the wonderful Summerland oil wells in the Pacific Ocean, and a most spectacular fire.

GAUMONT.

TWO FOOLS THERE WERE (May 26).—The homely, even tenored life of the two brothers of this story was very uncommonly interrupted by an accident which they happened to witness. While out hunting they noticed an automobile accident and ran to the assistance of its occupants. They found the chauffeur only slightly bruised, while the other occupant, a very pretty young society lady, was severely stunned. They carried the fair victim to their home, where their parents and friends nursed her back to health.

In the meantime, the two brothers had fallen for the charms of their visitor, and had daily presented her with an abundance of floral tokens and other marks of esteem. Such was their attention that their brotherly love grew to rivalry only to be followed by intense hatred, and in a fit of madness both brothers set out to hunt each other with the avowed purpose of murder. Fortunately they did not meet until after they came home, only to find that the young coquette had been called for by her father, who left a note stating that he would be only too delighted to properly thank and reward the kindness bestowed upon his daughter, were it not for the fact that with her and his future son-in-law he was making the next boat to America. The two brothers recognize that they have both been deceived, with the result that they shake hands and enjoy their wonted relations in which brotherhood reigned supreme.

ZANETTO'S MARRIAGE (May 30).—Zanetto was a miserably poor but decidedly beautiful traveling musician, who, in the medieval days, lived by way of hand to mouth, making himself useful with his song and melody at receptions of all kinds and subsisting on what little money they paid him for his tuneful services.

One evening as he had fallen asleep from exhaustion underneath a large window of a castle, Zanetto had a vision in whhie the most beautiful young woman was pictured to be his wife. At the departure of the stars and the early fall of the morning dew, Zanetto's dream was rudely interrupted, but to the height of his delight did he notice a sedan chair with a sleeping valet on each shaft. He began to realize that this equipage was the property of the wealthy Marquis who lived in the castle under the windows of which he had passed the night. Spurred on by the vision that dazzled his dreams, Zanetto decides to play a trick and get inside the sedan chair. He pulls the string which makes known the fact that the occupant desires to be conducted to his morning's destination.

As fortune would have it the poor poet musician is conducted to the home of the beautiful Phyllis. As he alights from the equipage the valets realize their mistake; but it is too late inasmuch as the beautiful creature before them refuses to allow Zanetto to leave her presence. The young maker of melodies sings and plays his way to the lady's heart, much to the discomfiture of the old Marquis, who, after discovering the loss of his equipage, made all haste to reach the side of the fair Phyllis before his rival could reach there. Seeing that he is very likely to be outwitted, the Marquis offers his fortune and his title if she will be his wife. However, Phyllis has taken a deep fancy to Zanetto, and responds as follows: "What means fortune and title when compared with youth. No, no, I shall marry my minstrel love."

THE RANCH WOMAN (May 27).—In this story of western life on the border, Peggy Wilson, a ranch widow comely and winsome, has become infatuated with Juan Gonzales, a Mexican gambler. To be sure, she doesn't know that Juan is really the character he is, although her cowboys try to open her eyes to the fact; especially her foreman, Bill Shank, who has a tender streak himself in her direction. The Mexican, pretending great devotion for the widow, manages to extract various sums of money from her willing coffers, which he gambles away.

For a side diversion, Juan has a beautiful senorita as a string to his bow, and she proves his undoing with the widow. Treating the senorita, as was his wont in a hasty way, her mother urges her to betray his double dealing in hearts and cards to the widow. This she does. The widow, aroused by the information received, verifies its truth in person and casts her infatuation and its cause to the dogs.

The spurned Mexican lover vows vengeance and proceeds to carry it out. He plots dire deeds against the widow. In the meantime, Dark Cloud, a Chippewa brave, whom the widow had done a good turn earlier in the game, sees a chance to befriend his benefactress. The fateful moment which the vallain has set for the dark purpose, is the ringing of the Angelus. This moment arrives and the widow is there, lured to her doom. But so also is Dark Cloud; and the vile Mexican meets his Waterloo. The Indian lifted him into the air and hurled him over the brow of the cliffs.

HEROES OF THE BLUE AND THE GRAY (May 29).—Two old veterans — one who fought under Grant, the other under Lee—are together on a family picnic. Becoming reminiscent of the days of '61, they quarrel. This quarrel leads them to separate their respective children, who are sweethearts. But the children quietly rebel against this mandate, and traitorously meet in love's fond embraces. In the meantime, the two old codgers have fallen asleep, and sleeping they dream of the days when souls were tried in the fiery vortex of internecine strife.

Now we see the old fellows as youthful heroes. With martial tread and bearing we see them in the van of battle. Charge and counter charge is made, and these two leaders meet and clash. Then each from the lips of Lee and Grant, receive words of praise for their valor. Then fades away the havoc of war. The two old veterans awake once more to life's present realities, and their sleeveless coats.

Then comes Memorial Day and the G. A. R. Veterans are marching to the cemetaries. Each one betakes himself to a grave with flowers and flags. The Confederate's son died at Gettysburg, the Yank's father at Antietam. By these two graves they meet in silent commune. Then they hear the familiar "taps," and as they turn to, they stand face to face. Once more appears a vision to them of their old leaders and comrades. Then the old fellows salute and they clasp hands with fervor. And in the background comes the sweethearts in warm embrace. And as we gaze on the vision which the old veterans have conjured up, and behold the grand union of hearts and hands, we rejoice while dropping a silent tear for the Heroes of the Blue and the Gray.

THE SMUGGLER'S DOGS (May 24 .—This is an exciting drama into which is introduced a realistic example of the use of dogs by smugglers on the Franco-German frontier. These sagacious animals are laden with little bags of tobacco, and let loose. Having been carefully trained they easily find their way home and stand a better chance of evading the vigilance of the customs officers than their masters. To catch these dogs the customs officers train other dogs who track them down. The film depicts the adventures of a young smuggler who is in love with, and beloved by the daughter of a sergeant in the Frontier Police. One evening he induces the foolish girl to leave her home and accompany him to the mountains. Night comes on and the shadows flit silently from tree to tree as the lovers journey through the forest—these are the dogs carrying their little bags of tobacco over the frontier. Following in their wake are the police dogs. All night long this grim pantomine goes on. The lovers hurry onward and the dogs seek to evade their relentless pursuers. Finally the lovers reach the smuggler's haunt and settle down to rest. Suddenly the harried dogs come rushing breathlessly in, followed by the police dogs. The smugglers, realizing that they are discovered, rush out to meet the police and a fearful fight follows. In the struggle the police sergeant accidently shoots his daughter, who thus pays for her folly with her life.

ARABELLA'S FLIGHT (May 24).—A really amusing short comic of the knock-about order has been founded upon the adventures of the Lux funniosity, Arabella. She goes out for a walk with her dog and is suddenly wafted unto the skies in an alarming manner. The history of her flight has been faithfully recorded by our camera man and is well worth seeing.

THE WHITE BROTHER'S TEXT (May 28).—Indian Louis is a converted red-skin and is laboring zealously in the cause of Christ. He opens a mission in a mining camp and tacks a notice in a conspicuous place inviting the miners to attend devotional exercises at his cabin. The miners are a rough lot and they resent the intrusion of the Indian. They send him word to leave the country or they will do him violence. He pays no attention to the threat, with the result that they call on him in a body and force him to quit the camp. Pete, a drunken miner, takes the initiative and handles Louis roughly. The Indian returns to his own people and there converts a brother to Christianity. Pete goes on a prospecting expedition and is bitten by a scorpion and staggers away for help. He is found by the converted Indian, who takes him to the camp of the Indians, bathes his wound and administers herbs to relieve the pain. He leaves his patient for a moment and Louis appears on the scene. He recognizes in Pete his old enemy, and is obsessed by a desire to kill him, forgetting the teachings of his Bible. He stealthily steals upon the prostrate Pete, and raises his knife when the convert returns and stays his hand. He admonishes Louis to remember the text, "Forgive Thine Enemies," one that Louis has always preached. The knife falls from the hand of Louis, and he is repentant and begs the forgiveness of Pete. The latter recognizes the spirit of forgiving and extends his hand, converted to the faith that Louis has always preached.

HIS SECOND WIFE (June 1).—Mr. Ellison is living happy with his second wife and their's bid fair to be an ideal union. His daughter, Alice, by his first wife, comes to make her home with them, and the first cloud darkens their existence. Ellison is very fond of his daughter, a beautiful young woman, and they spend many hours together, the wife being ignored, unintentionally. She resents the attentions of her husband for the girl and her life is suddenly made miserable. On one occasion Ellison gives his wife a present, a portrait of Alice, and then her bitterness is made complete. Arthur Maxwell, a young man with much leisure time on his hands, visits the vicinity and spends much time in the pretty grounds. He is found by Ellison, his wife and daughter, and the owner of the estate recognizes in him a friend, and gives him the freedom of the grounds. Alice and her father are, as usual, engrossed in each other's company, and Mrs. Ellison goes to find them. She meets Maxwell, stumbles and falls, when she is supported by the young man. The situation is most compromising, when Maxwell appears on the scene and finds his wife almost in the arms of the young man. He steals away and, when his wife returns home, there is a stormy scene. He accuses her of flirting. She retorts by accusing him of neglect, and that he may spend his time with Alice. The girl listens and comprehends the situation. She has been the means of the quarrel. She hastens to Maxwell, and begs him to go, but not to further compromise her stepmother. He promises to do so, and writes a note to Ellison, exonerating the wife. Mrs. Ellison has left the house, but meets Alice, who forces her to return, and through her intercession, a complete reconciliation is brought about. Alice destroys the note and is happy.

MAJESTIC.

PRISCILLA (May 26).—When Priscilla married James Newcomb he was very much in love with her. But after the honeymoon waned, he began to find domestic life a trifle dull. The young couple received an invitation to attend Lady Huntley's ball. Priscilla promptly refused to go. James became angry at her attitude and announces that he will go alone.

At the ball he meets a very pretty lady. He dances and flirts with her. She is wearing a miniature picture of herself. James asks her for it and she gives it to him. Next morning, when Priscilla is picking up his scattered garments she finds the miniature and is very much incensed. Her father, who has been away on a journey abroad, arrives home, and comes at once to visit her. He finds her in tears and asks the reason. She shows him the miniature and tells him of James' neglect. Her father tells her not to worry. He asks her to go to the tavern with him, as he has some presents there for her. She consents. When they get to his room Priscilla dropped her handkerchief. As she stops to pick it up, Beau Mackintosh, a notorious flirt, comes to the landing and gives it to her. At this moment a friend of Priscilla's husband passes the door and, seeing only the girl and Beau Mackintosh, takes it for granted that they are there together. He goes down to the tap-room and tells his companions. James drops into the tap room and his friend tells him that his wife is upstairs.

James refuses to believe it, but decides to see for himself. Meantime Priscilla has received a beautiful necklace from her father. She is just leaving the room as James dashes up. He demands to be allowed to see the man in the room, but Priscilla, angered by his unjust suspicions, refuses to let him in. He takes her home and later he arranges to fight a duel with Beau Mackintosh His friend carries the challenge to what he thinks is Beau's room, but is very much surprised to find Priscilla's father. The situation is clear to him at once. When the father learns of James' jealousy he to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

determines to teach him a lesson. Swearing the friends to secrecy he says that he will accept James' challenge.

James arrives on the field of honor at the appointed hour. So does the old man. James has not discovered his identity. Priscilla, who has learned of her husband's intention, hurries to the duelling ground and begs James to reconsider. Then, seeing that the other man is her father, she throws herself into his arms. Explanations are in order and a reconciliation effected.

LOVE'S CALL (May 28).—Jack Morgan, upon being jilted by the girl he loves, decides to renounce the world and enter a monastery. On the day that he seeks the monastery, he happens to see a pretty blind girl, who is on her way to the sanitarium. Jack is received as a novice and applies himself fervently to prayer.

In the meantime, the blind girl, May, leaves the sanitarium with a nurse. They are going to take a walk through the country. The nurse discovers that she has forgotten something and returns to the sanitarium. May wanders away and unknowingly walks on a railroad track. She hears the train coming, but gets bewildered and does not know which way to turn.

Jack, also out walking, sees the girl, and saves her life by drawing her away from the track. He takes her to the gate of the sanitarium. She gives him a little pin and feels his face that she may know him again. He gives her a rosary.

Some time later her eyes are cured. She rushes out into the sunshine alone. Morgan sees her, returns to the monastery, and changes his novice for civilian attire. The girl knows him at once. They become very friendly and he realizes that she feels the love for him that he feels for her. He bids her wait for him.

Going back to the monastery he tells the Abbot that he loves May. The kind old priest who has been watching him all unknowingly, bids him go back to the girl. Jack returns to May and brings her to the Abbot, who gives them his blessing and tells them to go in peace "for the church must have the undivided heart."

REX.

FROM GRASS TO GLASS (May 23).—There is something distinctly inspiring about a glass of pure milk, something clean and sweet and out-of-doory. If you have the merest imagination you will be carried off on a train of thoughts to a patch of Paradise in the Eden of summer; and if your imagination has had a few rehearsals you might even see a soft sunset, with the contented kine lowing their greeting to the descending night. A glass of milk has a lot of psychological suggestion and influence, too. Place some milk and say, some whiskey, side by side; surrender all your faculties, relax all your muscles and fibres, and mechanically reach out for one of the glasses. It's almost a safe prediction that you will take the milk without knowing why or how. Of course, there are a few colonels and other nuts who would pick the whiskey if they were asleep, but in our little psychological experiment, we don't include this constituency. Now, wouldn't this result justify the belief that the underlying, elements in our composition are wholesome and natural? See, even a glass of milk can teach a lesson of life.

"From Grass to Glass" is a pictorial tribute to milk and the system that brings it to the breakfast tables of the metropolis. From the modern dairy farm, nestling in the lap of the Berkshire Mountains, we skip to the cows themselves and show their nurses, feeding, grooming and milking; the receiving station; loading and icing cars; transferring the milk from the city railroad terminal to the pasteurizing plant; passing the pasteurized milk over the cooling pipes at the rate of 8,000 quarts per hour; washing and sterilizing cans and bottles by automatic processes; testing for bacteria; colonies of bacteria after incubation, and other interesting facts and factors in the most wholesome industry in the world.

STARS, THEIR COURSES CHANGE (May 26).—What if she was an actress—she was a petite, sweet, neat young thing, as pure as a young rose flirting with a zephyr. He thought he loved her an awful lot, and perhaps he did love her a little, but she loved him with a depth and devotion such as woman gives to man but once in her life.

Now this young man was not entirely independent. His uncle supplied the money for the flowers and dinners he tenderly tendered the girl. And it just happened that his uncle had an indefinite, anonymous aversion for stage girls. So when the kid told him all about his romance and the one who had created it, and her vocation, the silence of the listener and the hopes of the speaker were shattered. All the many fond dreams that had found shelter in the boy's mortgaged mind were suddenly dispossed, and sent scattering on the highways of despair. Have we told you, or haven't we, that the boy was just a little weak?

So he went to the girl and explained that if he married her he would be disinherited. The girl listened, and it would do your heart good to see the resolution and determination slowly graduate into a dynamic, dominant impulse. In the zest of her new zeal, she turned upon her lover and "Listen," she said, "let's show him there's something in us! I'll get a position as stenographer, you do something, anything, we'll both make good, then, with his consent, we'll marry." It might have been the soft, strong light in her eyes, it might have been the intense, intoxicating voice, but he caught the spirit of hope and the hope of endeavor and he accepted the challenge and charge.

But he was just a little weak—so he tired of a man's work and lay down! That's just what he did, he lay down! Poor, weak boy, he lay down! So he crawled back and told his uncle that he had changed his mind and was ready to do as directed. And would you believe it—his uncle was a real man, you know—it angered him to think that he had given up and he disinherited him anyhow.

The girl conquered the despair that followed the realization that her love-god was an idol of tin—and incidentally conquered the uncle's dislike for stage girls. In fact—well, you might hear of their marriage soon.

A MESSAGE FROM BEYOND (May 29).—Charles Kingsley's parents gave him everything they had when he left his home to start business in a large city. Charles, like other country boys, by undivided effort and persistent application, made his way to the top. He married a woman of high social position and has children, a son and a daughter. The daughter inherits her mother's snobbish characteristics, but the son is a democrat.

Kingsley's mother, a good, old, homely lady, not having seen her son for a number of years, decides to surprise him with a visit. She arrives just when the family is making elaborate preparations to receive the governor. Naturally, the snobbish mother and daughter make the old lady's welcome an unpleasant one. They don't know what to do with her until something occurs in the kitchen. Young Mrs. Kingsley then has her mother-in-law attend to the preparation of the dinner. The old lady is only too happy to be of service and joyfully undertakes the work of the cook.

When Kingsley, Jr., however, comes home and learns that his grandmother is doing the drudgework, he goes down there and sticks by her side, and in his boiled shirt and dress suit, assists her at her labors. He appoints himself her entertainer and does nobly.

The old lady, not long afterwards, dies and leaves young Kingsley her large painted portrait. Soon after when Kingsley is in difficulties, he imagines he sees the spirit of his old grandmother and she seems to point to the portrait of herself. Several times this occurs and in order to satisfy her spirit, he goes to the portrait, takes the picture out of the frame, and to his delight, finds an envelope containing a good deal of money.

JUST A BOY (May 31).—Mrs. Armstrong, having lost her child, is inconsolably unhappy. She passes a rather aimless existence. Even her devoted husband, who pays her constant attention, cannot take her out of that phlegmatic mood. One day she comes upon a policeman in the act of arresting a street urchin—a waif—a kid, who delights in street sports—such as dice-throwing, leap frog and banana-swiping from the "Ginny's" fruit stand. He is a wild boy—born and bred to the streets.

The boy loves dirt and delights in mud. She rescues the waif from the arms of the law and tries to bring him up as she would have brought up her little boy—had he lived. She tries to make the boy comfortable and happy and she almost succeeds—but the boy meets on the street some of his former associates and they revile him with jeers and call him "Sissy," and mock at his fine clothes.

The boy goes back home—to his fine room. He is thoughtful and morose. He has not been comfortable in tight shoes and clean linen. He longed for his rags and his old pals of the corners and the docks. With an air of determination he decides to go back to his former life—that care-free existence of the streets. He answers the call of the wild. He is just a boy.

A Warning to Moving Picture Theatre Owners

Word has come to me that some one else other than myself and posing as the original Kid Canfield is now making the Moving Picture Theatres and small Vaudeville houses throughout the Eastern part of Canada with Moving Pictures portraying myself as taken by the Champion Film Company.

This notice is to give all Moving Picture Theatre and Vaudeville houses warning against the showing of my act by any Faker, and will be prosecuted the full extent of the law.

I am now open for booking in conjunction with my own 2 reels.

Yours very truly,
KID CANFIELD.

MOLLY HIDES THE SHERIFF

THE RUSTLER'S DAUGHTER

Molly, acting as her own detective, finds that her father and his men are horse thieves. Returning, she helps a stranger who has met with an accident, takes him home, where to her horror she learns that he is the Sheriff searching for the horse thieves. The Gang returns home and on dividing up the spoils an argument follows in which Molly's father is shot. The Sheriff, hearing all, telephones to his posse. Upon their arrival they arrest the Gang. Molly, grieved over the death of her father, begs to be arrested also, but the Sheriff refuses, remembering her kind act.

SAY! WHAT IS SAID ABOUT POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6?

SAY! What Does Prof. Henry Phelps Gage of Cornell SAY?

That "run at normal speed, Power's No. 6 absolutely projects without flicker."

SAY! What Do Reports of Prominent Lecturers SAY?

That Burton Holmes, Dwight Elmendorf, Fred Niblo, Lyman H. Howe, all use Power's Cameragraph.

SAY! What Do Sales Records SAY?

That Power's does 60% of all the moving picture machine business.

These things ARE said and they are TRUE; they couldn't be unless Power's Cameragraph No. 6 was the best moving picture machine made.

Power's Adjustable Inductor is the economizer for you to use on alternating current.

Good Comedy!

"Dottie's New Doll"

is the style of funnyfilm, featuring the Thanhouser Kidlet, that you can't afford to let your exchange deprive you of. You will realize this best if you see it before a tickled-to-death audience in SOMEONE ELSE'S THEATRE—after your own has been "passed by" by an unbusiness-like exchange. The Kidlet is just too cute for anything in this and—YOU SEE YOU GET IT!

RELEASED FRIDAY, JUNE 7

Good Drama!

"Her Secret"

was shared by Mignon Anderson and the Thanhouser Kid—clever photoplayers!—and it is revealed to you so interestingly that you are "held captive" for the quarter-hour. Then, when the spell is broken, you will thank your lucky stars that you are dealing with AN EXCHANGE THAT SUPPLIES GOOD FILM regardless of politics. Feature this 'way ahead if possible.

TO SCENARIO WRITERS

The Powers Motion Picture Company wishes to purchase the

Highest Class of Photoplays

Obtainable—stories of American Life-Dramas and Comedies. To this end we will inaugurate a prize contest and offer the following inducement to stimulate writers to better effort:

First prize $100.00 Third...... 50.00
Second .... 75.00 Fourth..... 25.00

CONDITIONS OF CONTEST:

All manuscripts must be typewritten and accompanied by return postage or self addressed envelope.

All scripts must be addressed to the scenario department and labeled, "Contest." Otherwise they will be treated as regular contributions.

The stories will be read and passed upon by a committee composed of moving picture experts. All contributions considered available will be purchased. The names of successful authors will be placed on the films.

In the future we will pay the highest prices for scenarios commensurate with their worth.

The contest is now open and will close July 15, 1912, and all manuscripts in competition will be held until July 20, 1912.

Address all communications regarding this contest to the scenario department.

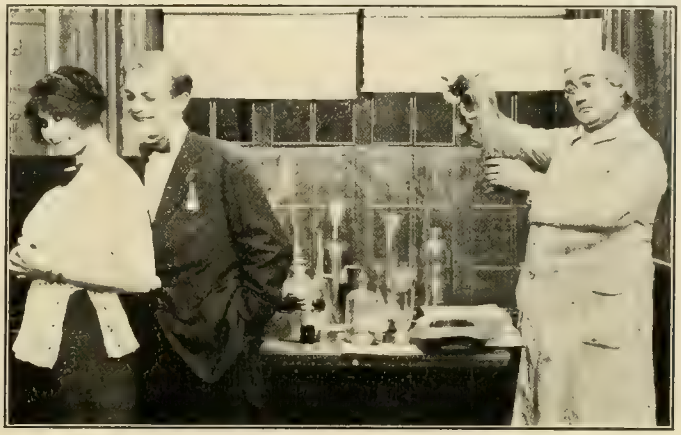
FRA DIAVOLO

(Two Reels.)

From the famous Italian Opera. Fra Diavolo (My friend, the Devil) is a production alive with sensational incidents. Diavolo is a sinister Italian Bandit Chief who is as romantic a character as Robin Hood, the Scotch outlaw.



Scene from "The Great Discovery."

Released Wednesday, June 5th.

THE OLD VIOLIN

A poor violin-maker, in dire need of necessities, is confronted with a great temptation. The temptation is overpowering. He is about to substitute one of his own violins for one valued at $10,000 when his daughter interferes and calls him back to his normal senses. The story has all the qualities of a true drama.

Released Friday, June 5th.

SPLIT REEL:

THE DOG-GONE QUESTION

Billy is a dog poisoner. He persecutes an old near-sighted doctor with his mischief. The doctor has a hobby for dogs—but Billy's hobby for poisoning animals gets him, as well as the doctor, in lots of trouble with the police and some members of the army of the unemployed.

On the Same Reel:

BILLY BOY

He is a flirt and after going through some flirty experiences which turn out not at all as he had planned, Billy decides that flirting is not a healthy occupation.

Important Announcement

In the future Powers Picture Plays will be released Wednesday and Saturday and the split reel will be released Wednesday instead of Tuesday.

"Babies Three" and "There's Many a Slip"

a comedy split. The former is a delightful child story that will appeal to all, as it is a tale of domestic life, in which a little girl furnishes the complications.

"There's Many a Slip"

is a decidedly humorous tale in which a trio of lovers seek to win the hand of a girl. The right man—aided by circumstances—wins, and his rivals incur the displeasure of the parents. Every foot a laugh. Released Wednesday, June 5. Book this split for a business stimulator.

"Hats and Happiness" is a pleasing society drama with a wholesome and convincing lesson, elaborately staged and interpreted by the stars of the Powers Motion Picture Company—a strong story with human interest appeal. For Release Saturday, June 8.

EDITORIAL

"Coming events cast their shadows before," but when the event has passed the time called present it casts before it what may be considered more substantial than a shadow. The shadow forecast of the Rex Third release was the unanimous and universal popularity of the Rex Productions. The future promise and the general result of the event are symbolized and illustrated in the present and pronounced prosperity of Rex Boosters!

REXTRA

REX Company Announces Third Release!

Event Promises Greater Progress and Prosperity—Exhibitors Receive Statement with Enthusiasm—Trade Considers Achievement Distinct and Decisive Triumph of Merit.

The Rextraordinary announcement of the Rex Third Release comes as a half-expected surprise and a universally desired effect. As every effect has its cause, and as the cause precedes the effect, it might be old news to state that the cause for the happy decision on the part of the Rex Company was the constant and consistent demand for quantity as well as quality. The attitude taken by the Rex Company prior to its second release was paralleled in the present instance, in that its interest in the interests of the industry would not permit it to heed the insistent and persistent requests of the exhibitor for another release until it felt it could do so and still adhere to the sterling standard it has established. In making the announcement of a third release, the Rex Company states that the endorsement and enforcement of the exhibitors that made this course possible and necessary will be fully justified and rewarded.

The first third REX production will be released and the very title, "THE DIAMOND PATH," tells what it leads to!

TUESDAY, JUNE 4th

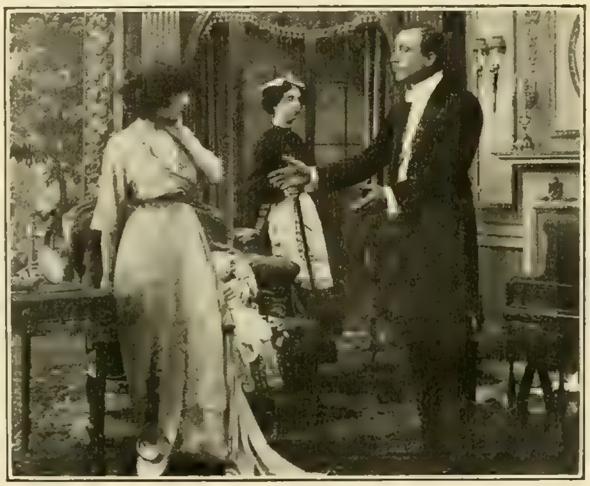
The Puppet's Hour



In a toy shop the life-size puppets come to life to celebrate the new year. Mignon, the society puppet, is warned that she must return by 12 o'clock. Ted, a handsome young fellow, is neglecting his sweetheart because, though eminently good, she is not pretty. The society puppet drifts in, they fall in love, the time passes so quickly that she forgets the hour, and when Ted takes her into his arms she turns to an old crone. He then goes to his true love.

Released Thursday, May 30th, 1912

The Honeymooners

Harry and May Nugent, just married, try to jump the usual fuss of rice and old shoes and taking an auto fly to the depot. There they find the train is an hour late, also that Harry has left the railroad tickets at the house. The husband rushes back and the bride cuddles herself up in a corner of the waiting room and goes to sleep. The friends track her and find her asleep, also a portly gentleman with his face in close proximity to hers. The husband is furious, but finally realizes the joke, but they have to stand for the rice and old shoes.

Released Saturday, June 1st, 1912

The Rubes' Easter at Atlantic City

Two rubes and their sweethearts are enjoying an Easter holiday at Atlantic City. The men strike up a flirtation with two summer girls and decide to lose their own companions for awhile. The new girls suggest that they improve their dress, which they do, then the real sweethearts come upon the scene and there is a lively chase to see which pair of girls shall win out.

Length 317 feet

Revenge

Jack Carroll and Jenny Norton, of Hankville, are sweethearts. Old man Norton don't like Jack and drives him off the farm at the point of a shot gun. Old man Carroll retaliates and goes to the Norton farm with an axe. The two old men have a good rough and tumble fight and the sweethearts take advantage of the row to slip off and get married.

Released Monday, June 3rd, 1912

A Romance of the Border

Pedro, a young Mexican, is in love with Rita, the daughter of Sergeant Blake. Captain Fields one day surreptitiously cuts a lock of hair from the girl's head and then boasts of a conquest to his brother officers. The old Sergeant remonstrates and there is a quarrel in which the Captain overpowers the old Sergeant. Pedro comes upon the scene and kills the Captain. Sergeant Blake is accused, but Pedro declares that he did the shooting and, making a dash for liberty, escapes.

SPECIAL EDISON RELEASE

in three reels

To be released June 10th, through the General Film Co.

The story of "Martin Chuzzlewit"—one of Dickens' masterpieces—is known all over the civilized world. This Edison photoplay of it is particularly well-timed for exhibition during the year of his centenary. The three reels have already been exhibited in England, and the following brief comments show with what enthusiasm they were received by the press and public:

> "The pages of Dickens' novel are literally brought to life."—Country Gentleman and Land and Water.
> "No theatre should miss this extraordinary production. It gives a clear and vivid rendering of Dickens' favorite story and all the well-known characters."—The Era.
> "The film can be justly described as a masterpiece."—Bioscope.
> "The acting is superb, the make-up and production are unequalled, while the photography is flawless. Altogether the picture is part of a genuine effort to raise the tone and standard of motion picture playhouses."—Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly.
> "The story is told vividly and completely, with plenty of action and dramatic power."—Morning Standard.

Facts and Comments

AN esteemed correspondent in Detroit asks us to take note of an outburst of yellow journalism against motion pictures, and requests our reply to the foolish remarks of the editor of one of these papers be forwarded to the offender. We fear that the editor complained of belongs to the class that does not want to learn the truth. His ignorance, therefore, is of the invincible kind, and as the ancient Roman said, against that kind of ignorance "even the gods contend vainly." In a large city like Detroit it ought to be possible to get the true position and the great merits of the motion picture before the public without "the aid and consent," and even in spite of one particular journalistic foe. Let us not get angry, because we are right and the other fellow is wrong. Place the real facts and the honest truth before the public and they will speak for themselves. Speak for the right, but avoid controversy, for it is, in nine cases out of ten, absolutely useless.

IF the movement for the production of feature films keeps up it is not unlikely that many exhibitors will soon be able to go back to bi-weekly or tri-weekly service. It appears that many great features in licensed and other camps are now under way. Once the exhibitor can count on at least one big feature per week he will want to run such features three or, at least, two days. The drawing capacity of a big feature film is not exhausted, but rather stimulated, by early runs. Even in a big city the feature film will pay better when it is a month old, because by that time it has had a lot of valuable and extensive advertising. The number of large legitimate theatres now on their last legs because of moving picture competition is growing larger every season. It will pay to have such theaters devote themselves entirely to the exploitation of features, properly presented. The features will bring the money, where big, expensive attractions, stock companies and vaudeville have failed. The present conditions all point to a greatly increased production of features. There is not much doubt about the quantity; the thing to guard against is the deterioration of quality. Even now there are many "feature films" on the market that are little better than a "delusion and a snare."

WHENEVER we read of an agitation or crusade for making motion picture theaters "absolutely safe and secure for the public" we begin to look around for the manufacturer who has something to sell to the exhibitor. This method of forcing exhibitors to buy when they do not want to buy and have no need of buying has attained a high state of development. Some years ago "public sentiment" in the State of Pennsylvania clamored for asbestos booths. The newspapers were full of demands for this "imperative reform." In response apparently to the commands of their constituents the Legislators passed a law requiring exhibitors to forthwith install asbestos booths of certain detailed specifications. Strangely enough just about twenty-four hours after the Governor had affixed his signature to the new law exhibitors throughout the State received a letter from a firm of manufacturers advising them they had exactly the kind of booth required. Inspectors and officials everywhere "boomed" this particular booth. This is "salesmanship" of a finely organized and almost piratical nature. Emboldened by their success in Pennsylvania certain manufacturers have succeeded with the aid of the usual manufactured and paid for public opinion in passing an exactly similar law in New Jersey. This law is even more rigid than that of Pennsylvania and leaves no choice to the exhibitor. He must buy from the manufacturers who conceived, pushed and finally enacted the law. There may have been some justification for the Pennsylvania law, because at that time regulation was lax and some exhibitors were tempted to take a chance occasionally. It is entirely different now. In the last two or three years exhibitors generally have, of their own free will and out of a sincere regard for the safety of their patrons, provided booths that are as safe as human skill and ingenuity can make them. We have seen dozens of roomy booths, built of concrete. Under the new law these booths must be torn down to make room for the type which is sold by the manufacturer favored by the legislator. There is but one way in which exhibitors can meet such modern piracy—they must organize and fight back. The enforcement of this and similar laws affecting exhibitors of motion pictures is fitful, lax at one time and rigid at another. Where the "inspectors" or "city electricians" or other officials get a gratuity from the manufacturer for "pushing" the exhibitor the latter must yield at once or shut up for the letter of the law is with the "grafters." Where the exhibitor is a man of some standing in the community enjoying the friendship of influential politicians the "inspector" may give him a reasonable time. We know of one case where an iron booth of faultless construction had been in use and the exhibitor, who kept a small but very safe and clean place, pleaded for a little time to install the new booth. The exhibitor tried to explain to the official that the present booth was safe and had been found very satisfactory always. The inspector for an answer drew a specimen of the asbestos board from a shelf on his desk. The name and address of the firm making this particular kind of board was plainly printed on the sample.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD notes with considerable satisfaction the decided victory of the Dayton, O., exhibitors in their fight for Sunday entertainments. The exhibitors there showed the right spirit and dared to fight for their legal rights. They were willing to submit to personal indignities and humiliations for the sake of a principle, and they have carried their cause to victory. We hope to see their example bear fruit in other States, especially in the East, where exhibitors seem backward and unable to understand their own rights. We have on many previous occasions advised exhibitors in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania to make a test case of Sunday opening, and have offered legal assistance to exhibitors within the State of New York outside the boundaries of the boroughs constituting Greater New York. Of course it must be borne in mind that we advocate the proper kind of pictures for Sunday use: pictures of religious, semi-religious or educational character. There is no doubt that under the decisions of the Court of New York State such a picture program as we have indicated would be entirely lawful. Lectures explaining stereopticon slides may be given anywhere on Sunday, and why not motion pictures with lectures. So many clean and classic subjects are on the market to-day, that it ought to be an easy matter to compile a suitable Sunday program. In the last analysis Sunday opening is a matter of public sentiment. Decayed and antiquated statutes cannot ever successfully be applied to modern conditions, if public sentiment favors a liberal Sunday. Public sentiment has for the last few years steadily veered around to the motion picture, and public sentiment will be the exhibitors' greatest friend if they put on a program that will reckon with the character of the day.

THE number of motion picture theaters discarding their intermission slide is steadily on the increase. No recent innovation in the conduct of the exhibiting business has found favor with the public so quickly and so widely. Nothing is more tiresome than a long wait between reels, and if there is no wait at all it means more patrons, every one of whom acts like a paid advertisement. There is the advantage, too, of emptying the house more quickly and making room for the crowd that waits in the lobby. On Saturdays the no-wait system means more comfort for the patrons and more money for the exhibitor. The additional expense necessary to insure the prompt working of the no-wait system is slight compared with the undoubted benefits resulting therefrom. Two machines, one good operator and one good assistant ought to be equal to all the demands of the truly continuous show. One of the things which makes the mixed program of vaudeville and pictures more endurable than it otherwise would be is the quick change from vaudeville to pictures. What is good for the house of mixed programs ought to be equally good for the straight picture house.

HARBECK PICTURES IN LITIGATION.

Action has been commenced by Catherine Harbeck, as administrator of the estate of William H. Harbeck, deceased, against Charles Wynard, George Hamilton and C. B. Clements in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, to secure possession of a series of motion picture film said to be unlawfully in the hands of the defendants. The titles of the films in question are "The Round-Up," Pendleton, Ore., and "Panoramic Views of Alaska in Animated Maps."

In her petition the plaintiff prays that the defendants be restrained from using the pictures in any manner or from disposing of them, and that they be required to deliver all prints and negatives to her.

Upon the petition and affidavits submitted by Mrs. Harbeck, Judge Hand issued an order for the defendants to show cause why the petition of the plaintiff should not be granted. The order is returnable May 24.

In speaking of the action, Mr. Wynard claims that Mrs. Harbeck has been ill advised; also, that he holds certain rights to exhibit the pictures in question from Mr. Harbeck, and has been acting within his rights.

POWER'S INAUGURATES A PRIZE CONTEST.

The Powers Motion Picture Company realizes there is a dearth of suitable manuscrips being submitted to that concern from which to select subjects suitable for filming. The Powers Company announces that it will release higher class pictures in the future and to that end the scenario department has been instructed to inaugurate a prize contest which is now open and will close July 15, 1912. Prizes of $100, $75, $50 and $25 are offered for the four best stories, the merits to be decided upon by a committee composed of moving picture experts. The names of all authors will hereafter be placed on the film and the highest prices commensurate with merit will be paid for all manuscripts purchased.

The Future of the Photoplay.

By Bannister Merwin.

THE present condition of photoplay production requires analysis. And though the analysis I wish to make is carried out from the viewpoint of the writer of photoplays, the conclusions reached will be as important to the film manufacturer as they are to the photoplaywright.

The determining elements of the motion-picture business to-day are the film manufacturers and the public that patronizes the photoplay theaters.

Up to the present time the public has been so much under the spell of the novelty of this new form of entertainment that it has not developed much discrimination as to film quality. The film manufacturers have been able to put on the market about anything they pleased—excepting where there appears to be a transgression of morality—to put on what they pleased with an almost complete confidence in the avidity of the market.

But the ultimate success of the business absolutely depends upon that public discrimination which is certain to develop—which has already begun to develop as the novelty of the entertainment wears off. The public is bound to discriminate between good productions and poor ones. The time is not far off when the photoplay theaters will measure their success by the quality of their programs. The first step will be the special attention of the public to the productions of those film companies which are to be recognized as putting out the best films. When this discrimination becomes marked, the photoplay theaters will reflect the condition by demanding of the sales agents such films as will satisfy their audiences. No guaranteed market will last very long after this situation arises. It can't. Under such conditions the continued operation of a guaranteed market would simply put the photoplay theaters out of business. There would be no more golden eggs. The goose would stop laying.

I feel sure that I am right, then, in saying that the future of the motion-picture business will depend on film quality.

How are the film manufacturers going to be able to insure the improved film quality that will meet the demands of the developing public taste?

By better photography? In a certain degree. In the age of aeroplanes and wireless I, for one, will not deny the possibility of perfect stereoscopic motion pictures in natural colors.

By developing the art of acting? Also in a degree. We have seen what progress has been made in a few years in the development of an acting technique that is natural and convincing and intelligible on the screen. Your photoplay actor no longer finds it necessary to point to his stomach to show that he is hungry. He can get his hunger to the screen by the manner in which he looks at a chunk of bread.

These two developments are coming naturally. They are invaluable. But they will not, in themselves, hold the ultimate public—the public that is already tired of "trick films."

No, the real future of the business absolutely depends upon the development of the art of writing photoplays. Without this art the business, as a provider of entertainment for the people, will vanish into shadow.

Two considerations have hitherto hampered the development of the photoplaywright. The first is the prevalence of the method by which the film company purchases the bald idea and leaves it to the producer to carry that idea out. The second consideration is a corollary to the first: it is the absurdly low prices that the film companies have paid for so-called "scenarios."

With the work of the producer I have no quarrel. He has been doing what the business has superficially appeared to demand—what the men in control of the companies have expected him to do. But the conditions have, to say the least, really hindered the development of his own true function—the function of interpretation.

Suppose Pinero were to offer "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" to a theatrical firm in the form of a three hundred word outline, and leave it to the firm's stage manager to do the rest. Might we not be justified in thinking that too much of a burden was being placed on the stage manager? Is it not a full tax on his abilities to stage well the play that Pinero has written?

The analogue holds. A photoplay producer may be a photoplaywright as well as a producer. He may even produce his own photoplays. But to require of him to write other people's photoplays for them—putting it mildly, isn't it asking too much of him?

Of course, as far as the present moment is concerned, the answer is that we have no trained photoplaywrights. The most successful ones are, after all, only learning.

But there is just the point. It is up to the film-producing companies now—to-day—to begin to encourage the training of photoplaywrights—men who can conceive and elaborate with full detail strong, human, convincing stories for the screen; men who are trained writers and know how to give to a group of characters the touches that mean life; men who have the instincts for dramatic values; men who can put a punch into what they write; men who have taste and judgment and are not raw melodramatists. With the development of such photoplaywrights, the future of the business will be assured.

How can this development be begun? By paying good prices for good work. Nothing else will draw trained writers into the work. It's worth considering, Mr. Film Manufacturer. You are making a business success with an embryo art. For your own future interest, it is up to you to help that art to grow. The more difficult it may seem to develop these new artists, the more strenuously should you endeavor to develop them.

Another thing. Almost every live, popular magazine employs a man whose principle job is that of editorial impresario. His most important work is to find promising writers. He travels a thousand miles sometimes just to see a man or woman—perhaps a beginner—whose first attempts at writing show that he may develop into a better than average writer. And if the good promise of that first work seems sufficient, the editors encourage that writer in every possible way. They advise him as to what they think he is especially fitted by nature to do for them. They give him elaborate and patient criticism. They increase their rates of payment to him as rapidly as his improvement justifies the increase. They nurse him along as something very precious indeed.

Would it not be well for the big film companies to adopt like tactics?

"PEPTONIZED AND PREDIGESTED TEACHINGS."

By Wray Bartlett Physioc.

Though the motion pictures are far from having reached perfection, it has already conferred various and important benefits on society. These benefits must be augmented, as the art progresses.

What motion photography is doing, and is still more largely to do hereafter, for increasing the knowledge and happiness of the public; what, heretofore, the traveler alone could witness, even the humblest may now behold, substantially.

This animated weekly brings the individuals of our race, however widely dissevered by material distances, into more or less close proximity and communion with each other.

The most essential step towards the mutual regard and unity both of individuals and communities is, that they should know each other alike in their dispositions and sentiments and in their exterior modes of life. For the promotion of this end, these current events of the world as pictured in motion photography have a value beyond calculation.

The natural scenery, grand, beautiful or picturesque, of every quarter of the globe; the noblest edifices, secular and religious, of the most highly civilized lands, together with the weird, fantastic piles; reared by semi-barbaric peoples to their strange gods; the multitudinous reliques still remaining of the skill and power, the pomps and the glories of the most celebrated peoples of the ancient world; the localities, on either continent, where conflicts have been waged, or events have occurred, which have acted powerfully on the destinies of nations, and perhaps have turned the currents of the world's history into other channels.

The inhabitants of every zone, from the Arctic to the Anarctic circle, with their costumes and their exterior ways of life; the finest existing specimens of art, ancient and modern, of foreign countries or our own; the most exciting, impressive, and awful acts or scenes which may occur anywhere at any moment—all these, and whatever else of interest the world may present to the sight, caught as they may be, with absolute exactitude, by the motion camera, are now brought within reach of all, even the lowliest of the community.

If all these things which the public are thus supplied with and abundant and infinitely various stores of knowledge and entertainment are characterized as "peptonized and predigested teachings," let them, as the Moving Picture World said editorially last week, let them make the most of it.

Motion photography, we believe, is destined to do much for the education of the people. No limit can be set to the possible development and progress of the art.

One of the most important directors of the several Lubin stock companies is Lloyd B. Carleton, a man of wide experience both in dramatics, literature and travel. The director of a production is seldom known or heard of, his name is never in print, yet he is the maker of the picture, of the show offered to the public. Carleton is a master of stage mysticism and can boast of being the right-hand man of such artists as E. S. Willard, Annie Russell, Maude Adams and other stars of the Charles Frohman management. One of Carleton's achievements was a flying trip to Australia to produce "Peter Pan." He boarded ship at one day's notice and with little preparation made one of the biggest successes of the Frohman management. With the Lubin Manufacturing Company he has selected the dramatic work and many of the successful photoplays are the result of his able and finished direction.

Independent Factions Organize.

UNIVERSAL AND FILM SUPPLY COMPANIES GETTING READY FOR BUSINESS—BOTH FACTIONS ANNOUNCE LIBERAL POLICIES AND GIVE ASSURANCE OF SUFFICIENT AND SATISFACTORY PROGRAMS—FILM SUPPLY COMPANY WILL CALL IN JUNK PICTURES—FEATURE SUBJECTS TO BE EXPLOITED BY BOTH SIDES.

EVENTS are moving swiftly in the factional contest that has developed in the ranks of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company. It is announced by the leading members of both sides that there will be no compromise and that each will continue on well defined plans of organization, irrespective of the other.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company occupies a large suite of offices on the seventh floor of the Lincoln Building, No. 1 Union Square, N. Y., which is the scene of unusual activity. The Film Supply Company has completed its organization and taken an entire third floor in the new building at 131 West 44th Street, where its officers are busily engaged in perfecting the company's plans.

Universal Company's Policy.

Regarding the policy of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Mr. C. O. Baumann, president, authorized the following statement:

"The Universal Film Manufacturing Co. is the corporate title of that wing of the Sales Co. which is not seeking the acquirement of exchanges and which has been formed as a protective organization against the encroachments of the Film Supply Co. of America and its allied organization, the Mutual Film Corporation. The Universal Co. has also been formed to meet the requirements demanded by the forty-nine Independent exchanges affiliated with the Sales Co. These requirements include exclusive territory and programs of uniform quality and of a higher standard than heretofore sent out by the Sales Co. These forty-nine exchanges exclaimed against the cheap productions offered by several manufacturers, who, by means of the then existing conditions, marketed their films through the Sales Co., and received many times the value of their output. Better producers, actors and stage settings are demanded from these manufacturers.

"The Universal Film Mfg. Co. is, in a sense, a merging of the interests of the Independent American manufacturers composing it. Instead of each studio and its force being employed exclusively in the production of films of a certain brand, as in the past, there will be, so to speak, four studios under one roof; that is, the forces and settings of all four studios will be at the disposal of a producer, if the occasion requires it. It will be understood, of course, that the studios will not be under the same roof, but that the pooling of interests makes the working practically the same.

"Say, for example, that one of the component firms of the Universal has a fine comedy subject, but not an expert comedy producer. That firm will have at its disposal the best comedy producer in the employ of the component firms. So it can draw on any of the others for appropriate settings, if they have them. The same working will apply in the case of dramatic, spectacular and feature subjects.

"It will be seen that a great saving will be made in this interchange and exchange of producers, actors and settings. No one firm could afford to engage such high-class producers and actors, and build for one special occasion such elaborate and costly settings, as will be possible under the announced policy of the Universal Company. Thus better quality is assured and the average standard of the output of the Universal will be raised.

"In connection with the foregoing, it must be remembered that the Universal has promised to engage as fine producers and actors as can be secured. The producers will be under the supervision of a general managing producer. Indeed, the latter will engage them, and with them will be held responsible for results. Keeping close supervision over all will be the managing directors of the Universal Company of Manufacturers.

"In the production of feature films it is not expected that a profit will be made. Rather is a loss looked for; but this loss will be overcome by the sale of many prints of the regular films, the quality of which has been uniformly raised, as already shown.

"The Universal Company will start with a weekly release of twenty-four reels, and it is the object to double this number in the course of time. All affiliated exchanges must take the entire output of the Universal, but to insure exhibitors of an adequate uniform quality, all of the twenty-four releases must be uniform in quality, otherwise they will be rejected, even though made by the Universal. However, the exchanges are permitted to select the best of the product of the Film Supply Company's output.

"It is the further intention of the Universal to engage continually in the making of spectacular feature films, produced without regard to cost, and which will be intermingled with the regular weekly programme. No special prices will be charged for these features when exhibitors use the Universal service."

It is further learned that the Universal will have at least three features in its weekly programme at the beginning, and that it intends to add others, sufficient to give all exhibitors one feature daily; that is to say, there will be seven feature films in the Universal programme in the very near future.

Bearing further upon the policy of the Universal Company, the following telegram, emanating from the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, was sent to all exchanges on the date of May 22nd:

"Following is programme with release days:
"Monday—Imp, Nestor, Champion.
"Tuesday—Republic, Powers.
"Wednesday—Nestor, Animated Weekly, Champion.
"Thursday—Rex, Imp.
"Friday—Victor, Ambrosio, Nestor.
"Saturday—Imp, Powers, Republic
"Sunday—Rex.

"Below is a list of additional films with their release days: Beginning Saturday, June 1st, two-reel '101' Bison; beginning Sunday, June 2nd, Itala; beginning Tuesday, June 4th, Rex; beginning Wednesday, June 5th, Powers; beginning Friday, June 7th, Ambrosio and Nestor; beginning Tuesday, June 11th, Gem, also '101' Bison two-reel; beginning Thursday, June 13th, Bison; beginning Friday, June 14th, Victor (a new brand of which Harry Salter will be producer and Florence Lawrence the star).

"We understand that the New York Motion Picture Company will ship Bison films direct. Your present standing order still requires notice of two weeks for cancellation. Orders for additional brands should be wired in immediately. Florence Lawrence will appear in all Victor releases. All Gem releases will be produced by George Nicholls, late producer for Biograph and Thanhouser."

The present programme is further announced in the advertisements of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company on another page of this issue.

Organization of Film Supply Company of America.

The Film Supply Company of America, under which title is grouped Thanhouser, Gaumont, American, Great Northern, Reliance, Eclair, Solax, Majestic, Lux and Comet companies, completed its organization on Wednesday, May 22nd, when its charter was granted under the laws of the State of New York, and the following officers elected: President, Herbert Blache, of the Gaumont Company; vice-president, Ingvald C. Oes, Great Northern Film Company; secretary, Harry R. Raver, Eclair Film Company; treasurer, C. J. Hite, Thanhouser Company. The board of directors is constituted of the foregoing officers and S. S. Hutchinson, of the American Film Company; Wiliam Grey, Comet Film Company; H. E. Aitken, Majestic; George Magie, Solax; Paul Hernaud, Lux, and Seymour Stuart, Reliance. The capital stock is equally divided between the various companies composing the corporation.

Permanent offices of the company were immediately engaged at 131 West 44th Street, where the entire third floor—55 feet by 100 feet in dimensions—will be occupied by the executive and shipping departments. Possession of the new quarters was formally taken and business there established on May 23rd. The programme of releases is announced by the Film Supply Company to consist of twenty reels, in the following order, beginning Monday, June 10:

Monday—Eclair American, Comet, American.
Tuesday—Thanhouser, Majestic, Gaumont.
Wednesday—Reliance, Solax, Gaumont Weekly.
Thursday—Eclair American, American, Gaumont.
Friday—Lux, Solax, Thanhouser.
Saturday—Great Northern, Reliance, Comet.
Sunday—Paris Eclair, Majestic.

In addition to the programme of regular releases, the Film Supply Company announces that a regular feature film department has been established, and that feature subjects will be leased on an exclusive territory basis. The features will include Eclair productions, both foreign and American, Gaumont, Great Northern and Film D'Art. The latter company it will be remembered is the one which made the famous Bernhardt and Madame Rejane pictures, entitled, "Camille" and "Mme. Sans Gene," now being shown in America. It is also announced that the regular releases will include the famous Gaumont colored subjects, and the Eclair microscopic and scientific hand-colored subjects.

Policy of Film Supply Company.

Secretary Raver, of the Film Supply Company, declares that the new company has no agreement with any exchange, nor has it any agreement with the Mutual Film Corporation, and is prepared to deal with any established exchange taking the exclusive Film Supply Company programme.

"The purpose of our organization," said Secretary Raver, "is to stimulate competition among manufacturers for higher quality of pictures and the product of every producing company must come up to the required standard. A number of applications have been made to us by outside companies, but up to the present time no action has been taken. One important reform which we expect to accomplish is the retirement of 'junk' pictures and the abolishment of the 'junk' exchange. We estimate that there are about 125 junk exchanges doing a business of $125,000 per week, which business should go to the regular exchanges handling good pictures.

"The Film Supply Company will lease and not sell its film. All films will be leased for a period covering the life of the copyright, but after one year from date of the contract between the exchange and the Film Supply Company, one reel of old film must be returned for each reel of new film received. This will gradually take the junk out of the market."

Mr. Raver declined to state at this time just what number of exchanges had contracted for the Film Supply Company's programme, but said that a sufficient number of exchanges to cover the entire territory have agreed to handle the exclusive programme of the Film Supply Company.

Both factions seem to be determined to put the needs of the exhibitor above all other considerations. Conservative men seem to be at the head of each faction and the campaign for business promises to be a clean one.

SEEN IN NEW YORK.

The past week has seen many well-known figures of picturedom in New York City, and everybody is talking "new movement." We can look for big doings among the Independent manufacturers within the next few days.

Chas. C. Pyle, sales manager for the Exhibitors' Advertising Company, Chicago, Ill., visited our New York offices this week on his way back to Chicago, after visiting the exchangemen and exhibitors of the South and East. The entire trade is anxiously awaiting the outcome of the Independent "split" is his report.

We were pleased to meet J. V. Bryson, manager of the Laemmle Film Service, of Minneapolis, who is in New York to "get a line" on the new movement.

Carl L. Gregory, formerly with the Thanhouser Co., N. Y., has incorporated a Feature Film Manufacturing Co., with himself as president. The new company is located in City Island, N. Y.

C. Lang Cobb, sales manager for the Reliance Co., N. Y., has just completed a ten thousand-mile trip, and joyfully handed us the news that he had landed every exchangeman he called upon for a standing order for Reliance films.

Abe Warner, of Warners' Features, handed us a tip that he is shortly to release a military feature in three reels, with an entire regiment of mounted men, who posed specially for these pictures. S. Warner is now on a Western trip and has reported the sale of "Redemption" and "The Glass Coffin" for western Pennsylvania to the Imperial Feature Film Co., of Pittsburgh.

* * *

A. A. Kellman, the recent purchaser of the Victoria Theater, Lawrence, Mass., one of the finest theaters in the New England States, tells us he is having a large call for feature films from his patrons. The Victoria Theater is a house of 900 seating capacity, is equipped with all improvements of the most approved style, and is suitably adapted for the work Mr. Kellman has planned for it to do: that of being the center for feature films. The Victoria is booking all the features of the Special Feature Film Co., 5 West 14th St., New York City.

I just had time to shake hands and say howdy-do, to Mr. Lux, manager of the Rex Film Exchange, of Albany, and Mr. Smith, of Buffalo, whom I met on the street. They are to be in New York City for a few days. WATSO.

COBB RETURNS FROM SUCCESSFUL TRIP.

Mr. C. Lang Cobb, general representative of the Reliance Moving Picture Company, returned to New York during the past week after a highly successful tour of the United States, extending from New York to the Pacific Coast. Mr. Cobb succeeded in securing additional standing orders and was of great service to his firm in special matters which have been developing during the past couple of months. By the time this notice is in type he will probably be on his way to the coast again, or some other part of the universe, looking after the interests of Reliance.

LUX COMPANY TO IMPROVE PRODUCT.

Mr. R. Prieur, New York representative of the Lux Film Company, appeared to be very optimistic during the past week regarding the bright future which he sees in store for the Lux product. There has been a big change in the management of the Lux factory and Mr. Prieur is now one of the directors of the company. They are going in for better stories if the highest prices will buy them. Expense will not be spared on any of the productions, either as to talent or furnishings. Under the new arrangements for the distribution of Independent film, the Lux Company figure that they can put more money into negatives by virtue of the increased sale of prints.

A LUBIN FOREIGN SECTION.

Arthur D. Hotaling and a picked company of players headed by Miss Mae Hotely will leave for Europe in a week or two and will spend the summer and possibly the winter abroad building up on the Lubin "Gay Time" series in which a new twist is given travel views through the introduction of a comedy story as has already been done in the Lubin releases, "A Gay Time in New York City," "A Gay Time in Atlantic City," "A Gay Time in Jacksonville," etc. The company is at present working in Atlantic City.

SELIG MAKES SPECIAL RELEASE OF SHRINER PICTURES.

During the recent Shrine Convention at Los Angeles, California, the Selig Polyscope Company secured several thousand feet of excellent pictures. Each event was caught by the cameras of the Selig operators, and from the film thus secured, the Selig Company have selected a one-thousand foot reel. This will be released as a special on Wednesday, May 29th. The pictures show various views of the Shriners' parade, in which were represented temples from every corner of the county, views of the beautiful floral parade given in honor of the visiting Shriners, views of the drill teams taking part in the prize competiton, and scenes showing the mammoth barbecue and field day. Many close up views of past imperial potentates, and past and present Rabbans and potentates are shown in the film and it will be anxiously looked forward to by Masons and their friends throughout the country.

MR. H. HIBBERT, OF ENGLAND, VISITING THE STATES.

Mr. Henry Hibbert, F. R. G. S., Managing Director of Hibbert's Pictures, Ltd., of England, is the latest representative of the English film trade visiting the States. He was a welcome visitor at the New York Moving Picture World office this week and fully upheld the good opinion we have formed of the several English cousins in the trade who have recently been on this side of the pond.

Combining a little pleasure with business, Mr. Hibbert has a son and daughter with him and intends to go across the States to California and return through Canada. Being enthusiastic camera experts, their photographic outfit is not the least part of their baggage and a few thousand feet of film will be one of the souvenirs taken back when they return to England.

The head office of Mr. Hibbert's company is in Bradford, England, with branches in Bristol, Leeds, Huddersfield, Nottingham and in Glasgow and Edinburgh, Scotland. In addition to the film renting and theater outfitting branches of the business, they have several large picture houses seating from eight hundred to three thousand.

Genial, hearty and thoroughly optimistic in regard to the picture business, our visitor increased even our own enthusiasm and, as he has been in the game from the start, his opinions are backed by years of experience, which is worth remembering.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

MRS. JOSEPH T. BOWEN, president of the Juvenile Protective Association of Chicago, addressed the quarterly meeting of the organization at the Hull House, May 17, during which she announced that the association is preparing an ordinance, which will be presented to the city council soon, requiring the owners of all moving picture theaters to keep their places lighted while pictures are being shown.

"The many dark spots of these theaters are filled with dangers for the young," said Mrs. Bowen in her address. "While the pictures are being shown all the light is concentrated upon the screen and the remainder of the theater is left in darkness. In these dark spots young men and women congregate and disaster overtakes many as a direct result."

"We expect the theater owners to fight the ordinance, but we hope for its passage."

Picture theater owners, the great majority of them, have no reason to fight this ordinance, from the fact that by far the greater number of Chicago picture theaters are lighted while pictures are being shown. On the contrary, the big majority of Chicago exhibitors should support, and strongly support, such an ordinance, so that every remaining dark house in Chicago, if there be any, shall be compelled to use the indirect lighting system. It is a crime against motion pictures as well as against decency, to have a single dark house in the entire country, when the means of remedying the evil is right at hand, at reasonable cost.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America should fight the dark picture theater as being the worst foe of pictures at the present time. It furnishes overzealous reformers and ever-ready brand to throw into the exhibitors' camp. Close the dark house, if it will not become lighted.

Prize Winners in Selig Contest.

The winners in the Selig contest for the best articles on motion pictures, the contestants being confined to members of the Chicago Press Club, were announced Saturday, May 18.

The winners were as follows: First prize, $100, Robert A. Ward; second prize, $50, Henry Irving Greene; third prize, $25, De Lysle Ferre Cass. Prizes of $5 each were awarded Wm. L. Visscher, H. Bedford Jones, Roy O. Randall and Chas. Lederer. Articles by the following were recommended for purchase at $5 each: Rev. W. H. Carwardine, Henry Irving Greene (a second article), Horace H. Delano and Arthur E. Ormes.

It was the opinion of the judges of the contest that the articles submitted were not up to the standard expected, excepting those awarded the first three prizes. The winning articles will be copyrighted by the Selig Polyscope Company and will appear from time to time in leading periodicals, dailies and trade papers.

The judges were: Wm. M. Roberts and Leroy T. Goble for the Press Club, John Pribyl and James S. McQuade for the Selig Polyscope Company, and Edward J. Mock, of Motography, cast the deciding vote in tie cases.

Opening of the Parkway.

F. O. Nielsen, proprietor of the Parkway Theater, North Clark Street near Diversey, is to be congratulated on the great success of the opening of that handsome house, Wednesday, May 15. There was a splendid turnout of the residents in the locality and one could not fail to observe the refinement and intelligence of the audiences.

"The Coming of Columbus" was the opening attraction and its presentation gave great satisfaction. Miss Martha Butler, the talented soprano from the Lyric, Minneapolis, and Wm. J. Hill, of Chicago, baritone, sang during the intermissions. Miss Butler sprang into immediate favor and will always be welcome to patrons of the Parkway. She will remain for two weeks, after which she will fill another contract, signed some time ago, but will return some time in June.

The interior decorations of the Parkway elicited much favorable comment and the splendid indirect lighting system was highly praised. The house was practically dark before Manager Nielsen secured it. Business has remained steady since the opening night. The admission is 10 cents.

Chicago Film Brevities.

When in Chicago at the meeting of exchange men, Wednesday, May 15th, Carl Laemmle, president of the Imp, was seen and requested that the following telegram sent out to independent exchanges from New York, May 14th, be published: "Last week's advertisement in Implet withdrawn. Don't want to sell Laemmle Film Service. Advertisement written weeks ago, and I meant it, but big changes have taken place and the Laemmle Film Service will continue as heretofore. I apologize for false alarm." This advertisement appeared only in the Implet, but led to considerable correspondence with Mr. Laemmle from exchange men.

John Pelzer, of the kinetoscope department of Thomas A. Edison, Inc.; Robert Lieber, manager of the G. F. Co.'s branch in Indianapolis, and Schuyler Colfax, of the Eastman Co., Rochester, N. Y., were visitors in Chicago last week.

George H. Hines has leased the Warrington Theater, Oak Park, for the summer. The Warrington seats 1,000 people and Manager Hines will present de luxe licensed pictures at 10 cents admission, up to September 1st. The Lyda, also owned by Mr. Hines, will be run all through the summer. Mrs. Hines will manage the Lyda and Mr. Hines the Warrington.

* * *

A. A. Davison, auditor of the Selig Polyscope Company, returned recently from a business trip to London and Paris, which occupied seven weeks. The coal strike in England, at the time he was there, interfered greatly with the presentation of pictures in the United Kingdom.

I. L. Lesserman, city salesman of the Laemmle Film Service, returned a short time ago from a trip to Germany, where he spent seven weeks. He states that the moving picture business is in a very flourishing state in that country, but that the projection is not so good as ours. American pictures are in great demand and there are a great number of American subjects to be seen in most of the theaters. Mr. Lesserman tells me that the German picture theaters have had interior illumination, the houses being practically dark. Many theaters run American subjects exclusively, with perfect musical accompaniment. The number of pieces in the orchestra run from 3 to 15. The prices in picture theaters run from 10 to 60 cents in Germany.

The National Convention Committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Chicago has everything in tip-top shape and in good working order. Letters have been mailed to manufacturers of supplies, supply houses, etc., as well as to exchanges, throughout the country, and a steady stream of replies is coming in daily. Great interest is being taken in the coming convention and all informaton concerning it is asked for by correspondents. Work on the souvenir program has begun. This publication will be about the size of the World's page and will have valuable reading matter and several fine photos giving views of celebrated buildings and resorts in Chicago and vicinity. It will be printed on fine quality paper and is expected to furnish a fine sample of the printer's and engraver's art. Fred Hartman has been added to the National Convention Committee, and assigned a place on the committee on publicity. It is expected that M. A. Neff, national president, will pay a visit to the city shortly, as an invitation has been extended him by the local league. A follow-up letter has been mailed to all Illinois exhibitors, by the secretary of the Chicago local, requesting them to join the league before the national convention is held.

Lewis & Merkle, owners of the Illinois State rights of "Twenty Years in Sing Sing," are showing to fine business in Chicago. They opened with a two weeks' solid run at the Bijou Dream, State and Monroe Streets, and are soon going back for another two weeks' engagement. They report good business everywhere throughout the city.

The Dearborn Novelty Company has moved from 634 S. Dearborn to 219 S. Dearborn, in the Temple Court Building. This company makes a specialty of supplying managers with outfits on the easy payment plan, and report excellent business.

RELEASE DATE CHANGED.

Power's Motion Picture Company Will Put Out Split Reel On Wednesday Instead of Tuesday.

The Power's Motion Picture Company has decided to change the date of its first release in the week from Tuesday to Wednesday, and hereafter the split reel subject will be released on Wednesday. Exhibitors can govern their bookings accordingly. The first release will be June 5.

Doings at Los Angeles.

World Correspondent Points Out Need of Exhibitors' Organization—David Horsley Active. Big Selig Production Under Way.

[Special Correspondence to the World.]

THE cause of the exhibitor is in sad straits in Southern California. With one of the most profitable fields in the United States, and a field which not even the most pessimistic exhibitor contends is overcrowded, there is absolutely no co-operation among the men who ought to be standing together for the mutual good and for mutual improvement. Instead it is a case of every man for himself.

The pity is that there is now in existence in Southern California the skeleton of an organization—an organization that might be made wonderfully useful with just a little effort and attention. About two years ago the Los Angeles exhibitors got together and formed the Southern California Motion Picture Men's Association, with about 100 active members. Officers were elected and for the first few meetings there was a fairly good attendance. Then the interest fell off and the organization was practically abandoned. Since then one or two efforts have been made to revive it, but they have been futile. To-day the nominal president is a man who was an active exhibitor, but he has retired from the business. The rest of the members seem to care so little for the organization that they have not taken the trouble to elect a new president.

Recent talks with some of the leading exhibitors of this city disclose the fact that the chief obstacle to the formation of an effective organization is a belief that no one will take an interest in it. Each man says that he would if the others would, but he assumes with an air of finality that the others won't. The trouble is that the exhibitors here have had no hardships to drive them together. They have never had a common enemy to fight and so they have developed a false sense of security. Sooner or later they are certain to be threatened with some of the various ills that have fallen upon exhibitors elsewhere—hostile legislation or antagonistic public sentiment manufactured by some fanatic—and then they will be unprepared to defend themselves. It is better to head off a movement of this kind than to try to defeat it after it has gained some impetus, but it cannot be headed off unless the exhibitors are prepared for prompt, decisive and concerted action at the first sign of trouble.

Nestor Pulls a "Scoop."

The Nestor Film Company pulled off what newspaper men call a "scoop" on its competitors May 10, when it obtained the only pictures which were taken of Glenn Martin, the California aviator, when he made the first aeroplane flight ever accomplished across the Santa Catalina channel. Martin flew from Balboa, on the mainland near Los Angeles, to Avalon, the famous pleasure city on Catalina Island. The distance is a mile or two greater than the distance across the English channel. Besides being a little longer than the English channel flight, the Santa Catalina channel trip is more difficult on account of the more precarious landing on the island. The flight was made without previous announcement. Even the daily newspapers knew nothing about it until an hour or so before Martin soared into the air. The Nestor people, however, had been in Martin's confidence for several days and were enabled to make their arrangements in advance. Pictures were obtained showing him at the start, over the water, disappearing in the distance, coming in sight of Avalon and landing. Pictures were also taken showing his return to the mainland within a few minutes after he reached the island.

The following day Martin took up with him in his hydroplane A. Vallet, cameraman of the Nestor Company. It was the intention to take birdseye pictures of the beach cities along the coast, but a slight accident to the machine forced Martin to bring his passenger down within a few minutes after the ascent. Vallet and Martin are now arranging for another flight within a few days, when motion pictures will be taken of the city of Los Angeles and its suburbs from an elevation of 3,000 feet. These will be worked into an educational film to be put out as soon as possible.

On the same day that Vallet took up his camera, David Horsley, owner of the Nestor Company, took an aerial joy ride with Martin and enjoyed it so much that he persuaded Martin to consent to another trip when they will attempt a 75-mile flight across country. Horsley says he wants to get as many sky rides as possible before this is printed because, after his wife reads about what he is doing out West, he knows she will never let him leave New York again alone.

To Picture Tousey's "Wild West" Stories.

Although he expected to return to New York several weeks ago preparatory to making a European trip which will keep him abroad until August, David Horsley, owner of the Nestor Hollywood studio, is still here. He expects to get away within another week.

The thing that has kept him so long beyond the date when he planned to leave is a new series of Western pictures which are now in preparation. Just before he left New York, Mr. Horsley made arrangements with Frank Tousey, publisher of the Wild West Weekly, to make photoplay productions of all the stories which appear in the weekly. These stories are all of the rather sensational Wild West type, but the weekly has a large circulation to testify to how popular they are with a certain class of readers. Arrangements have been made whereby Tousey will furnish the Nestor Company with proofs of the stories several weeks ahead of publication. These will be cast into photoplay form and produced so that the pictures will be released simultaneously with the appearance of the current number on the newsstands. The weekly will contain a notice on the cover calling attention to the films which can be seen at the independent houses, and the main title on the films will make a similar reference to the weekly. In this way each is expected to advertise the other to the mutual advantage of Horsley and Tousey.

The first Wild West Weekly picture is now being prepared by Director A. E. Christie, who has been putting out the Nestor regular Saturday release. These pictures will come Saturdays in future. The two leads in the pictures—all the stories deal with the adventures of the same principal characters—will be Victoria Forde, who will have the role of "Arietta," and George Field, who will be "Young Wild West.

The Nestor Company is now going in for automobile racing pictures. Two of its cameras were kept busy all day May 4 at the big Santa Monica road race and Mr. Horsley, on his way back to New York, will stop off at Indianapolis to superintend the filming of the big race in that city May 30.

Bison Actor Killed.

Charles Balfour, one of the members of the Bison Company, fell from a galloping horse May 9 and sustained a fracture of the skull from which he died at a local hospital early the following morning. Balfour was one of the crack riders who appeared as a cowboy in most of the Bison Western pictures. His horse was making a sharp turn at high speed when its feet slipped and threw horse and rider. A strange coincidence was that "Bud" Osborne, another rider, who was following and came up to the scene two or three minutes later, was thrown at the identical spot and in the same manner, but escaped with slight injuries. Balfour was 24 years old and came from Rayville, La., where his people are prominent.

Thomas Yellow Horse, one of the real Indian actors employed by the Bison Company in their Western dramas, accidently shot himself through the right foot May 14 while taking part in the production of a picture in Santa Monica canyon, a wild spot near Los Angeles. Yellow Horse became excited and was thereby lead into the mistake of too much realism. He was sent to a Santa Monica hospital for an enforced vacation.

Selig Preparing for Big Production.

Preparations extraordinary are in progress at the Selig studios in Glendale just now, for the next two weeks will see the beginning of the biggest and most ambitious production ever attempted by that company. Although the name of it is not to be announced at present, it is to be a three-reel subject which will be literally cramped with big gorgeous natural scenic effects, and it will be richly costumed. The story is one with which every fiction reader is familiar. Manager Magee, of the Western branch, is now in San Francisco, and word has just been received from him that he has chartered a full rigged ship for use in the production and ordered nearly a freight car load of costumes. A small army of extra people will be hired for the production, which will require at least a month to finish if everything goes well. The indications are that it will be the most expensive picture the Selig Company has ever done. Colin Campbell is slated to direct it.

Selig Acts Shriner Pictures.

Motion picture cameramen were much in evidence all last week while the Shriners' conclave was in progress here. The result will soon be apparent no doubt in a host of pictures throwing side lights on the festivities. There were about 50,000 visitors in the city and one or more parades each day, winding up with the magnificent floral parade, which lasted four hours. The official pictures were taken by the Selig Polyscope Company, but several other companies caught bits here and there. One day was devoted to a review of all the patrols when thousands of Shriners in gorgeous Oriental costumes representing at least 150 different styles of costume went through their evolutions before a multitude of spectators assembled at Arcadia just outside the city. The pictures of this event were taken by the Kinemacolor Company also.

"Votes for Women."

A Serious Presentation of the Suffrage Propaganda, in Two Reels, by the Reliance Company—With Notable Cast.

THE women's suffrage propaganda was spoken of in these columns more than a year ago. The value of the motion picture for the furtherance of women's rights was written of at that time, and it seems that somebody did make a reel of pictures that dealt with women's rights either directly or indirectly. But the matter seemed to drop out of sight and has not been raised again until the Reliance Company took it up and made a big thing of it. as they have done in their latest two-reel production entitled, "Votes for Women."

Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw Addressing Wage-Earners' Meeting.

Probably it took a year for the idea to percolate, and for the leaders of the suffragist cause to realize that the moving picture could be made one of their greatest allies. At any rate when approached by the Reliance people the idea was adopted by the leaders of the National Woman's Suffrage Association. The ladies were enthusiastic, and in order to make the pictures authentic and representative of the cause, the principal officers themselves volunteered to appear in the pictures with the double object of aiding the cause and becoming personally known to thousands of women all over the world who already know them by name. Among those who appear in the pictures are Dr. Anna Shaw, the National president, and Miss Jane Addams, National vice-president, both of whom made the trip from Chicago to New York, expressly to appear in these pictures. In one of the illustrations herewith Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw is seen addressing a wage-earners' meeting. Seated at her left is Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, secretary of the New York State League. In the other illustration Miss Inez Milholland is to be seen at the right side next to the end lady. Some of the other ladies appearing are: Mrs. Harriet May Mills, president New York State League; Mrs. A. C. Hughston, Mrs. Chas. Beard, Miss Eleanor Byrnes, Mrs. Raymond Brown, Mrs. Marcia Townsend, Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, Mrs. F. Maule Cooley, Miss Anna Maxwell Jones, Miss Ann Forsythe, Miss Mary Keegan, Mrs. L. H. Ozedam.

VOTES

A Group of Prominent Suffragists in "Votes for Women."

The scenario was written by Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw and Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, and shows what the National Association is striving for. It opens with a scene showing the visit of the suffrage workers to a miserable family in a filthy tenement house. This tenement house belongs to a haughty senator who will not listen to the arguments of the cause. The suffragists plan an attack upon the senator through his heart. They learn that he is engaged to marry an estimable lady and they think that by enlisting her with the cause that they can eventually win him over to their way of thinking. In this idea they are correct, for the senator's fiancée succeeds in converting him and in making him an enthusiastic advocate of their principles. The picture is very logical throughout and proceeds step by step to show what the suffragist cause is striving to attain. The picture ends with the enormous suffrage parade, which recently took place on Fifth Avenue, New York City. This makes a rousing finish to a picture that will undoubtedly be of great service to the advocates of women's rights all over America.

A word of commendation should be said concerning the work of the suffragist ladies in the picture. They are not at all amateurish, as one might expect, but to the contrary they play their parts in a thoroughly natural manner and entirely to their credit.

ST. LOUIS MUSICIANS' STRIKE STILL ON.

The fight now existing here between the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association and some of the managers of local picture houses is waxing warmer every day. The trouble grew out of a demand on the part of the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association, a branch of the American Federation of Musicians, for an increase in pay of 33 1-3 per cent. to musicians playing the picture houses. The demand, according to the picture men, was exorbitant and they refused to meet it. Ever since the boycott was put into effect by the musicians the picture men claim they have been subject to indignities and threats which are interfering with their business, and a suit for a temporary injunction restraining strikers and sympathizers from interfering with the picture men has been instituted in the Circuit Court by the Cherokee Theater Company, a moving picture and vaudeville house at Cherokee and Ohio avenues.

Owen Miller, president of the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association, Local No. 2, and D. K. Howell, recording secretary; V. C. Wolf, financial secretary; Joseph Bergman, treasurer, and members of the executive committee, are made defendants. The Cherokee Theater Company aver that prior to May 19th, members of the organizations accused were employed in the Cherokee Theater and that on April 30th last the musicians employed by the Cherokee Theater were "urged, compelled and coerced by the defendants," in consequence of which they demanded a large and prohibitive increase in pay.

The Cherokee Theater people claim that pickets are being maintained and posters printed in red asserting that the Cherokee Theater is one of fifteen in St. Louis owned and controlled by O. T. Crawford, "a multi-millionaire." While walking along Broadway, near St. Charles Street, Joseph Gill, a "sandwich man" carrying a sign giving the names of moving picture houses classed as "unfair" by the musicians, was assaulted by an unknown man who kicked Gill several times, broke his sign and fled. The "boycott" is expected to be kept up all summer and further trouble is expected unless the warring factions can effect a compromise.

REX THE THIRD.

The royal family of Rex has an addition, or will have beginning with Tuesday, June 4th—new crown prints. The third Rex production, which the trade has expected and desired for a long time, is at last promised and scheduled for first issue Tuesday, June 4th. The title of the first Rex Third production is "The Diamond Path," and the exhibitors will doubtlessly make the signs that lead to it.

The Rex Third production is a tribute to earnest effort and consistent merit. It is not foisted upon the public in the hope that it will be accepted and endorsed. It is given them because of repeated and sincere requests for a third Rex. It is not released hoping it will be condoned, but rather with the confidence bequeathed by universal endorsement and consistent encouragement.

ECLAIR CHANGES RELEASE DATES.

Beginning with Monday, June 10, the Eclair Film Company will release its film plays on Monday, Thursday and Sunday until further notice.

The High Cost of Living.

A Modern Allegory Based on a Live Topic, Cleverly Done in Two Reels by the Eclair Co.

ANY argument bearing on relief from the high cost of living is almost sure to get a respectful hearing, especially if it endeavors to show a way out of the difficulty. The picture seems to be the best method of attacking the burning question. Long editorials, with endless statistics, may prove a great deal if anyone has the time and patience to read them, but the most telling work in the public press has been done by means of the cartoon, which tells a complete story at a glance. Everybody remembers the "Empty Market Basket." The mere sight of it at any time or place is sufficient to remind one of all the arguments against the high cost of living. The "full dinner pail" was another of those cartoon-editorials that became a slogan of prosperity some years ago. The cartoon has great power to teach and tell a story. This latest Eclair production is a cartoon, or animated editorial. In its progress the high cost of living is traced from the consumer, back through the channels of commerce, to its source, which is mercilessly revealed and is shown to be an oligarchy of greed bowing down before the golden calf.

BREAD
BUTTER-MILK

Scene from "The High Cost of Living" (Eclair).

As a modern allegory this picture is interesting apart from the interest that will be manifested by the public in the topic itself. Allegories are difficult matters to deal with. Each character represents such a composite of ideas that it is difficult to get it over to the audience with any degree of precision. The moving picture has its limitations in this respect, being deprived of the spoken prologue, monologue and epilogue so common to allegorical characters, and it is therefore all the more to the credit of the producer that this important topic is so well handled in such a simple and understanding way as was seen at private exhibition recently. The story will be well understood by those who see it in America. The various allegorical figures are well known newspeper cartoon characters and can be readily recognized.

A young American and his wife endeavoring to keep house, and to live decently and like human beings, come to the conclusion that such a thing is well nigh impossible at the present time. Instead of being availed by their frugal way of living they find themselves steadily drawing nearer the poor house. Their descent is sloped very gradually, but it is none the less sure and leads downward to despair and poverty. Together they fare forth with an empty market basket and go into the great American market to buy some food. Wherever they go they find the necessaries of life presided over and monopolized by an hostile and repulsive creature whose rule is to give as little as possible for as much as he can get. The prices marked for everything bear the same legend, "All we can get." At the great market are many others like themselves; people of the middle class who are struggling more to keep out of poverty than to attain social distinction. All comers are treated alike. They approach the food barons in temerity, because there is no other place to go. The necessaries of life are hoarded before these greedy keepers. The Temple of Mammon rings with the sound of gold and silver, and they pay, pay, pay!

The plain people gather together and appeal to the figure of Justice. Justice listens to their claims and knows that they are reasonable and right. The populace then goes back to the Temple of Mammon with Justice and destroys the golden idol. The glutted kings of produce are then placed under arrest at the command of Justice and brought to trial before the nation. Uncle Sam appears at this great trial as the prosecuting attorney for the Commonwealth. In the prisoner's dock are assembled our old friends, the coal trust, the beef trust, the grain trust, the sugar trust, the tobacco trust and other well-known trusts, each one trembling for his worthless existence. The jury returns a verdict of guilty and the kings of commerce are put in stripes and led off to the rock pile. They are not there long, however, for they resume their favorite method of defeating the people. The robber-barons overpower their guards and tie greenbacks over the eyes of the keepers, who are thus blinded effectively for all time. The plutocrats hasten back again to their Temple of Mammon. The shattered idol arises from the floor, in fragments which come together, and once more sits in its accustomed place, while the plutocrats resume their positions as custodians of the necessaries of life and pinch the people harder than ever. By them also Justice is kidnapped and placed in a prison cell.

There are many laughs through the picture which is not a serious or depressing subject. It will be readily understood by all, and while it teaches a powerful lesson, it does so in a way that is logical without being painful. The picture was produced by Monsieur Arnaud. With election time close at hand and the air surcharged with politics, a picture of this kind is the kind managers are looking for. No doubt the picture can be used at political meetings to forcibly point out the deplorable state of affairs into which this country has drifted.

FILM SEIZURE IN CLEVELAND.

A bill in equity, filed recently in Cleveland Federal Court, by the Feature and Educational Film Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, through their attorneys, Schwartz & Lustig, 511-512 Williamson Building, Cleveland, Ohio, has resulted in a complete set of films on "The Aviator and the Journalist's Wife," part one, two and three, being seized at the Imperial Theater, Cleveland, Ohio, where the films were exhibited without authority, and without the permission of the United States copyright holder of said films.

The Feature and Educational Film Company is the sole owner and holder of the American rights to show the films in this country, and are the owners and holder of the United States copyright on the films.

The bill in equity was brought in the United States District Court, asking for a restraining order, damages, and an order of seizure and at a preliminary hearing before William L. Day, judge of the United States District Court, an order of seizure was granted, directed to the United States marshal, ordering him to seize the films at the Imperial Theater.

The attorneys for the Feature and Educational Film Company insist that they will prosecute this case to the fullest extent of the law, as only by such methods can infringers of copyrighted films be wiped out from doing business under such nefarious methods, and against the copyright laws of the United States.

ESSANAY'S "MONTEZUMA" SPECIAL.

On Wednesday morning, May 29th, the Essanay Company's special train steamed out of Chicago, bearing the mammoth company who are to portray the stupendous pageant in three reels, "The Fall of Montezuma," a tale of the conquest of Mexico. The "special" comprises three sleepers, a diner and a 60-foot baggage car. The company, over two hundred in number, will live in the "special" until the completion of the last foot of film. Besides the company, the "special" carried attendants, physicians, Red Cross nurses to give immediate attention to any one who may sustain injuries during the action of the scenes, two cameras with their operators, the two producers who are staging the production and a small army of expert clay modelers who will fashion the massive settings required to duplicate the architecture of the ancient Aztec Empire. Thomas Stevens and Kenneth Sawyer Goodwin, both Chicagoans, are the authors of the scenario and will personally assist the producers as much as possible. The massive set-pieces required for the production have kept the carpenters in a turmoil for weeks, and the costumes needed have taxed the capacity of one of the largest concerns in the country for the past two months. The Essanay Company is sparing neither money nor untiring energy in making this great pageant one of the finest masterpieces ever attempted in the history of motion pictures, and the project assuredly affords striking opportunity for brilliant production.

Nat C. Goodwin as Fagin.

The First Five-Reel Version of Any of the Dickens Novels —A Forerunner of What Is To Come.

THE time is rapidly drawing near when the full evening's entertainment in one continuous picture will be the thing. A three-reel subject is too long for a short show and too short for a long show. The effort to condense a Dickens novel into three reels of moving pictures is sure to rob the story of much of its charm. There are hundreds of little character touches that must necessarily be left out of a condensed version of Dickens that are sadly missed by the great majority.

At present the full evening's play in motion pictures must be sponsored by an actor or actress of great prominence in order to awake the attention of the public to the fact that something unusual is going on. Hence it is that Mr. Nat C. Goodwin in the leading role of such a popular play as Oliver Twist, in an unabridged picture version, is bound to create a great interest. It seems quite certain that he will be the first one of a great number of thespians, who are rated among America's best, to appear on Broadway as a motion picture star. Mr. Goodwin has always been more or less progressive, and in this instance he has been obliged to ride rough-shod over tradition and prejudice in entering the photoplay field. The rest will follow.

Mr. Goodwin has made his bow on Broadway as a moving picture star. At a private exhibition during this week the five reels comprising the story of Oliver Twist were seen at Hammerstein's Theater, New York. In spite of the handicap of fearfully bad projection the picture was a great treat. There is a certain joy at settling yourself in a seat to witness a Dickens play in pictures that you know is not going to be butchered. We were sorry when it was over, because there was no more of it.

The production is admirably consistent throughout. The out-of-door scenes were selected with a nicety, and with deference to architectural conditions of fifty years ago. In other words, there were old-fashioned houses and scenes to correspond with the old-fashioned characters of the story. The part of Oliver Twist was beautifully played by Miss Vinnie Burns. She is easily the equal of Miss Marie Doro, who played the part with Mr. Goodwin at the Empire Theater. Charles Rogers as the artful dodger is just as effective as a photoplayer as he was in the Broadway production of this play. Bill Sikes is played by Mr. Mortimer Martine, true to every conception of that notorious character, while his dog is the same dog used in the Broadway production. This canine actor is the property of Mr. Goodwin.

Mr. Goodwin as Fagin, however, is the great pivot about which all else revolves. Surely Mr. Goodwin could not have enjoyed for thirty years the reputation he has were he not a powerful actor. His power is brought vividly to mind in these pictures. When it is remembered that this is his first appearance before the camera, his wonderful stage technique speaks for itself. Deprived of the aid of speech and appearing for the first time as a photoplayer the result is remarkable. It shows the wide gap between the novice and the master in a new field. Having done as well as what was seen at Hammerstein's the other day, much can be expected from Mr. Goodwin in further efforts before the camera. At all times the star of the piece is strong, but his death scene is great. The whole production is a worthy undertaking and deserves considerable praise.

This version of Oliver Twist is probably better suited to large theaters than to small ones, owing to its length and drawing power. Though it is possible that two exhibitions could be given with it during the same evening, if the first one were started early enough and there were no delays of any kind, much in the same way that Dante's "Inferno" is often exhibited twice in the same evening, or once, according to the desire of the manager. It is surely a feature in any event, and we hope there will be more like it coming along soon.

GAUMONT, JR., IN AMERICA.

Raymond Gaumont, the youngest son of Leon Gaumont, proprietor of the Gaumont Company, has recently arrived in the United States and will spend an indefinite period with the American offices of this eminent French concern, for the purpose of thoroughly acquainting himself with the conditions of the film industry in the United States. Young Gaumont has had good experience in the various other offices of the Gaumont Companuy, spending a large portion of his time at the London office. This is his first visit to the United States. In speaking of his plans, Raymond Gaumont revealed the fact that he intends learning the American film business in a most thorough manner, from the turn of the crank on the camera to the highest and most finished duty in the cinematographic industry. At present he is in Virginia and Maryland photographing events of timely and topical importance for the Gaumont Weekly. Young Gaumont, who bears a remarkable likeness to his father, is taking up his permanent residence in Flushing, not far from the studio.

ECLAIR MOVES TO BIGGER QUARTERS.

The Eclair Film Company has taken a large suite of offices in the Times Square district, moving its executive department to the handsome new building at 225-227 West 42nd Street. The laboratories and studios are being enlarged at the Fort Lee location, and now three stock companies are being worked steadily on the increased number of American features and special comedy dramas.

Nat C. Goodwin as Fagin in the Five-Reel Production of the Dickens Drama, "Oliver Twist."

"Martin Chuzzlewit."

EDISON PLAYERS GIVE A SUPERIOR PRESENTATION OF DICKENS CHARACTERS IN PHOTOPLAY VERSION OF THAT FAMOUS AUTHOR'S STORY.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

SOME of the big notes struck by Dickens in this least understood of his works are still sounding in our ears without our being wholly aware of their source. So much stress has been laid upon the peculiarities of Pecksniff, a character now taken to be symbolical of Puritanical hyprocrisy, so much has been written about the humorous traits of minor personages in the novel, and so much unfavorable criticism has been applied to the author's superficial presentation of conditions in this country, that it is now scarcely recognized that Dickens not only put his whole soul into the character portrayals as in most of his fiction, but that he here surveyed the great human drama from his loftiest standpoint.

I am perfectly aware that I am making a strong statement, but if it is free from misconception, if I have put it clearly, let it stand for demonstration, while I tell you that the novel is no favorite of mine and that the great writer has scattered his forces in telling the story. The Edison photoplay enabled me to concentrate upon the main issue, and I perceived the author's big purpose while watching the dramatic version on the screen, as I might never have done in re-reading the novel. I now understand why he wrote to a personal friend that "Martin Chuzzlewit" outranked in his own estimation anything he had previously done.

Dickens marshals two hostile forces under strange leaders. On one side is old Martin Chuzzlewit, a man of great wealth in feeble health; on the other is one of his many expectant relatives, Pecksniff, unceasingly praised in a satirical manner. He is an utterer of platitudes, this arch hypocrite, a pretended humanitarian philosopher. He calls his daughters "Charity" and "Mercy," and innocently exhibits them on all occasions as living evidences of his kindly, paternal sentiments towards the domestic relation and humanity in general. Pecksniff honors the family virtues; he gives vent to domestic overflows of affection; he is an ideal country gentleman of limited means, but we are never allowed to forget that his whole life is bound up in getting money by questionable methods within the law's pale. There are many like him, the "business-is-business" class.

Able and decent-living men pursue one object throughout their lives. They are honest according to business standards of the day; they are morally assertive and ruthless when some minor offender is caught disobeying the rules and regulations of trade; their measure of success is the getting of all the money to be had in a commercial enterprise, and they openly aim to lay hands on all there is to be had without regard for anybody else because they can not see that they are permitted to exhibit their selfishness by the generous support of those who do the world's work, as if self-maintainence was really superior to the mutual helpfulness which organized society and enables individuals to enjoy life and liberty in specialized pursuits.

Allied to Pecksniff by blood ties and vulgar greed are other relatives of old Martin Chuzzlewit, and, when the latter is supposed to be lying at the point of death at a neighboring inn, they all meet under Pecksniff's roof with a view to dividing the prospective spoils. What a company! There is Chevy Slime, whose sole asset is his family connection, and Tigg, the adventurous grafter who exploits Slime and his asset. There is Mr. and Mrs. Spottletoe, there is George Chuzzlewit, "a gay bachelor cousin, who claimed to be young, and had been younger," there are many others, including an old-fashioned villain, Jonas Chuzzlewit, who kills his father, Martin's brother, for the insurance money and later on murders a few others for what there is in it, but Jonas, alone, is primitive in his methods. He has not learned to incorporate.

Opposed to this hostile array of money-getters is a disorganized force of those who have won in the battle between proclivities and compunctions, on whom the highest ideals of religion and philosophy have begun to dawn. They are typified in true-hearted Tom Pinch, an exquisite character who draws love by radiating it, who gets more happiness out of life than even Mark Tapley, who has reduced life's philosophy to its simplest terms. There is old Martin Chuzzlewit's grandson of the same name, in love with the old man's ward, Mary, and many others, but the dominating character for good is, strangely enough the wealthy and cynical old man who gives title to the story.

Pinch Learns True Character of Pecksniff.

Martin Chuzzlewit, Senior, is cunning enough to keenly appreciate the base side of human nature, but not big enough to grasp its glorious and infinite variety. The ordinary worker gets a broad view of people through contact and common interest not enjoyed by the man who has easily made or inherited his pile. He rarely hops off the perch to mix with the mass for fear that the crowd may vulgarize or contaminate him. It is difficult for him to conceive that millions of people are not actuated by desire for gain in all that they do, and this warps his judgment. The thoughts of this natural leader are expressed just after he has executed and burned a last testament.

Return of Tapley and Martin.

"Another will made and destroyed, nothing determined on, nothing done, and I might have died to-night! I plainly see to what foul uses all this money will be put at last, after filling me with cares and miseries all my life, it will perpetuate discord and bad passions when I am dead. So it always is. What lawsuits grow out of the graves of rich men, every day; sowing perjury, hatred and lies, where should be nothing but love! Heaven help us, we have much to answer for! Oh self, self, self!"

Old Martin Chuzzlewit distrusts every person with whom he comes in contact, he repels spontaneous friendliness and sets himself against the whole world in an attitude of defiance, having acquired more than his just share of its goods. He is sensible enough to know that undervaluation of money is folly, but not wise enough to undertake the distribution of his surplus. His education, his environment, his very aspirations have limited his vision and so narrowed his tastes that he is incapable of fully enjoying what he no longer needs. There are others like him in these times.

We do not have to go further downtown than 42nd Street to find an army of petty crooks and grafters lying in wait for the money of visiting strangers. Lower geographically though higher in method are the merchants who corrupt and degrade buyers from all parts of the country who come to the city entrusted with important commissions. Then we reach the idle and decadent political hangers-on, including those so permanently entrenched that they can not be recalled. And we reach the arch crooks of steam yacht, automobile and aesthetic tastes who regulate monetary problems in the high-financial district, future occupants of The Hall of Fame, immune from punishment and incapable of believing in the nobility of work.

Perhaps another Dickens will come along and stimulate faith in human nature, one who can create a personal bond between himself and the people, and then we may see these types that once stood forth with cameo clearness revived. They will be the same as those shown in the novels of Dickens—they are immortal.

Jonas Accused of the Murder.

The clash of the two forces at work in this novel comes to a dramatic finish in the last reel of the Edison production. Over and over again we have watched the beautiful workings of woman's influence in such plays, but this time a simple-hearted man unconsciously brings the old millionaire to a finer realization of himself and his world. He is Tom Pinch. While his modesty makes him an easy mark at times, it leads him to serve all about him—close touch with poverty, deprivation and suffering has only warmed his natural sympathies—he is devoted with admirable delicacy, yet courageous, and he sounds more than any other character the infinite depths of loving and being loved.

The impassioned sensibility of the great author is only revealed in such types, and he uses them to enforce powerful contrasts. It is Tom Pinch who causes the hypocrisy of Pecksniff to become a monumental satire, Tom is the softening note in the readjustment of character relations, and it is he who finally calls out the lurking nobility of the leading character. Old Martin Chuzzlewit reveals the change that has been going on within him at the very moment he has the all-unconscious Pecksniff ensnared.

"The penance I have done in this house," said Mr. Chuzzlewit, "has carried this reflection with it constantly, above all others. That if it had pleased Heaven to visit such infirmity on my old age as really reduced me to the state in which I feigned to be, I should have brought its misery upon myself. Oh you whose wealth, like mine, has been a source of continual unhappiness, leading you to distrust the nearest and dearest, and to dig yourself a living grave of suspicion and reserve; take heed that, having cast off all whom you might have bound to you, you do not become in your decay the instrument of such a man as this" (indicating Pecksniff), "and waken in another word to the knowledge of such wrong as would embitter Heaven itself, if wrong, or you could ever reach it."

Here is a man of so-called success in process of admitting that he has only been a babe in wisdom until he acquired that knowledge not to be found in business or books, yet communicated in the warm hand-clasp of brotherhood that:

"Each human being has a heart and soul,
"And self is but an atom of the whole."

If he would soar to grander heights than those of getting all there is to get while there's getting, he must measure up to higher standards than those which menace the political and social liberty of the people.

We have men of ability at this moment aspiring to high places in public service, yet who are so blinded by ardent selfishness that they seem to have lost sight of the fact that power can only come from those entitled to confer it and is not at all of the individual, but of those people. A man's finest qualification for the highest office in the land lies in his ability to inspire and hold confidence among the common mass; he must love those who crown him, live for them and carry out his noblest ideals for their sakes irrespective of gratifying his personal desires. Ordinary people are better judges of human nature than those they elevate to office for the performance of political service. Dickens seems to have shared Lincoln's opinion that "plain people must be the best—God made so many of them."

The whole trend of this novel is to show the improved results obtained by binding individuals and groups in lasting ties of sympathy and self-abnegation to the betterment of the whole social structure, and I do not know where else among his masterpieces can be found a broader or more progressive view.

The photoplay is satisfactory in settings and types, bearing evidences throughout of the pains taken to subjugate this wandering novel to dramatic tractability, and not the least important, if it is not the very best, of all features in it is the happy ending. Grace a Dieu, it is not one of action. It reminds me most of one of those groups in old paintings, where a number of appreciative musicians are listening to an executive one perform on his favorite instrument.

The sweeter and more sympathetic elements of the story are gathered in standing or sitting groups, absolutely motionless and all but one listening, while each seems intent upon some ideal of happiness. One is seated at the organ and playing in tender mood. The organist is simple-minded, true-souled, kind-hearted Tom Pinch! As the light fades slowly from the scene, we realize that we have just begun to love the people in the story and sigh with regret that they must go so soon.

HERBST ENLARGES CIRCLE THEATER.

William P. Herbst, president of the Circle Theater Company, of Washington, D. C., writes that his company has purchased the property at 2103 Pennsylvania Avenue for the purpose of enlarging the Circle Theater. Improvements amounting to $15,000 will be installed, making the Circle the largest and most sanitary and up to date exclusive photoplay house in Washington.

AMERICAN HIRES MORE ACTORS.

Patrons of American films have no doubt wondered as to the identity of the new face seen in Western pictures of the American Film Mfg. Company. The newcomer is M. A. Nillan, a young man of promising ability, who has already scored a notable triumph under the "Flying A" banner. Nillan has been playing second leads for the last four or five weeks. He is well known in Western theatrical circles.

"A Reconstructed Rebel."

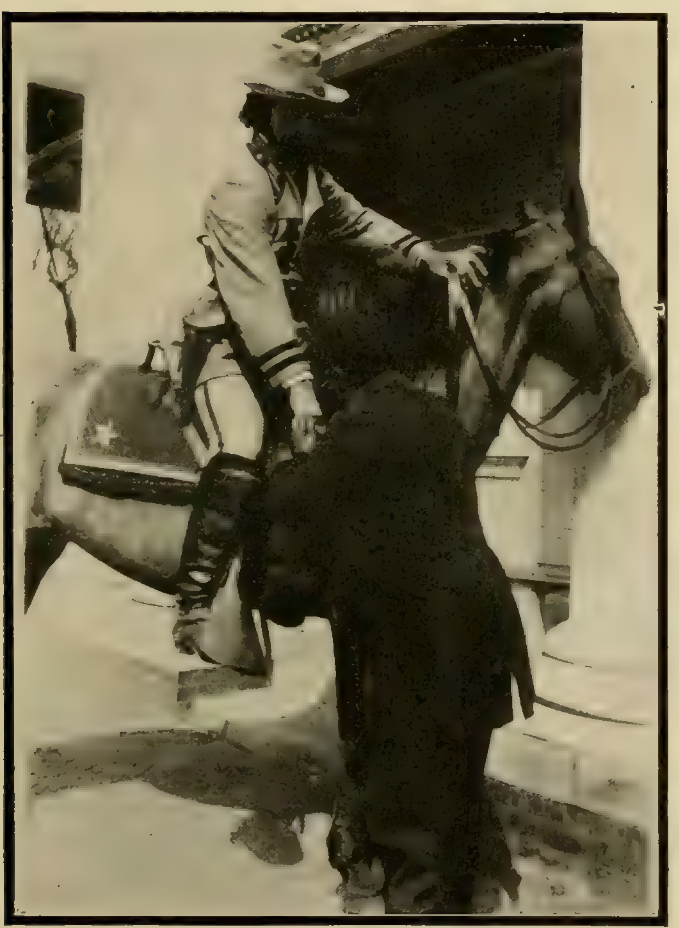
Stirring Patriotic Drama by Selig for Decoration Day Release.

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

SELIG'S release for Decoration Day is a stirring patriotic drama, entitled "A Reconstructed Rebel," produced by Colin Campbell and the Western company. That sterling photoplay actor and producer, Hobart Bosworth, is the prominent figure in the cast, and the other leading roles have been happily assigned.

There will be no charges made against this picture for lack of action. It is brimful of incidents that make the blood tingle and the face glow with patriotic ardor. Those scenes from the Civil War have a realism that is not often seen in mimic warfare. During the pursuit of a Confederate colonel by a troop of Federal cavalry, one sees saddle after saddle emptied, and the riders falling to earth while the horses dash on at full speed.

The attack on the American consul, in Honduras, by a mob of natives, and the spirited fight put up by the consul, his son and the old Confederate colonel against heavy odds, is another excellent bit of strenuous acting. One feels like cheering wildly as the marines from the American man-of-war in the harbor dash up, just in the nick of time, and put the rabble to flight.



Scene from "A Reconstructed Rebel" (Selig).

Throughout the entire film there is not a spot where the uniformly fine photography is marred.

The opening scene shows Colonel Yancey, an old Confederate soldier, seated on the porch of his little home in Tegucigalpa, Honduras. Unconquered, even when the Southern cause was lost, and clinging to the Stars and Bars as his only flag, the stern soldier had left his home and country, with his little girl, at the close of the war and settled in a strange land. Seventeen years had passed since then and the self-exiled soldier has become old and gray. We see him with bent head in hands, dreaming of the past; and scénes of the war in which he participated are unfolded on the screen.

His baby girl has blossomed into beautiful young womanhood, and has learned to love Dick Winston, son of Colonel Winston, the American consul at Tegucigalpa. Colonel Winston still wears the uniform of a Federal officer, which is a special thorn, in Colonel Yancey's eyes, though he himself equally offends the consul by persisting to wear the Confederate gray. They are not even on speaking terms, for the Stars and Bars float over Yancey's home, while the Stars and Stripes fly over the consulate.

Under such circumstances it is not to be supposed that the course of true love ran smooth for Louise Yancey and Dick Winston. Several times her father counselled her to keep away from Dick, and just as often does he find that his orders have been disobeyed. Several times, too, he caught the lovers in meeting and gruffly ordered Dick to discontinue his suit; but just as often does he discover that youth in blissful conversation with his daughter.

Scene from "A Reconstructed Rebel" (Selig).

Fate ordains, however, that the lovers shall be brought together. One day, while protecting an American citizen from a mob in the streets, Colonel Winston is himself attacked and is forced to seek refuge in the consulate. He sends Dick to the commander of the American war vessel in the harbor for relief, while he defends the consulate from the mob. Wrapping himself in the American flag, Colonel Winston fights desperately, but goes down under many blows.

Scene from "A Reconstructed Rebel" (Selig).

Louise has seen the outbreak of the mob and rushes in to tell her father. That old warrior arrives on the porch in time to see his countryman fall, and the flag that flew at Yorktown and Monterey dragged and trampled in the dirt. He rushes into the house and reappears with his revolvers. Then he hurries to the scene of the fray. We see figures falling right and left before his unerring aim, and the mob scattering from the spot where Colonel Winston lies. The latter regains his feet and the two old soldiers—the one in blue, the other in gray—fight shoulder to shoulder against the re-advancing mob. They are driven to the vicinity of Colonel Yancey's home where a last stand is made. Here they are joined by Dick, who had just reached Louise from one of the rioters.

The little party is in grave peril, when the American marines arrive on the scene and scatter the mob in all directions. The officer in command looks with surprise at the Stars and Bars, but orders his men to present arms. Colonel Yancey gravely salutes and then walks to the pole and hauls down the Confederate flag. Then he raises the Stars and Stripes and offers his hand to Colonel Winston. Both parents smile as they look on Dick and Louise, who are in raptures over the happy turn in their love affairs.

SCENES OF THE ITALIAN-TURKISH WAR.

An Authentic Cines War Picture To Be Released June 8th, by George Kleine—Views on Land and Sea.

The actual booming of the cannon is all that is needed to make one believe that he is actually on the field of battle, an eye witness of this great struggle. Much of the war is being fought upon the desert plains of Tripoli and the film opens with such a setting. We are first ushered right into the trenches where are located the immense cannon which are bombarding the Turkish position in order to protect the advance movement of the Italian infantry and cavalry. We are so close to the guns that the work of loading and unloading is very preceptible. When we see the immense recoil, we hold our breath in suspense, awaiting the deafening explosion, which, somehow, fails to come. The keen-eyed officers are directing the fire with the aid of the telemetre and a destructive fire it must be, for no sustained response is apparent from the enemy.

Scene of the Italian-Turkish War (Cines).

Our gaze is then turned toward the horizon where the forward march of the cavalry and infantry is in progress toward Bir Tobras. They proceed in long lines across the desert plains, exposed to the scorching rays of the sun and the danger of sudden attack from an ever-watchful enemy, who are excellent fighters and accustomed to desert warfare.

After showing several other land episodes of the conflict, the pictures turn to the war on the sea. We are taken on board the protected cruiser "Carlo Alberto," whose 10-inch guns are pouring a murderous rain of shot and shell upon the town of Zuara, on the Tripolitan coast. Again, we view at close range the action of these immense engines of war. The begrimmed gunners are loading, firing, and reloading with untiring efforts.

We then look out upon the deck where the ship officers are scanning the coast with their glasses, to ascertain the results of the cannonade. The town of Zuara appears to be in flames and pretty well destroyed, for smoke is arising from all sections, making it clear that the aim of the gunners is deadly accurate.

The film certainly ought to make quite an impression upon the moving picture public. People in general are always enthusiastic over war pictures, for they offer no limit to the possibilities of exciting and dramatic action whch is so important to the success of a screen production. However, when a film has these attributes and at the same time is an accurate portrayal of the actual events in the world's history, its importance is multiplied greatly and proves all the more interesting and instructive. We await many more such productions with the keenest of pleasure.

REMODELING THEATER.

Mr. E. H. Chambliss, proprietor of the Lyric Theater, Iowa Falls, Iowa, writes us that he is remodeling every section of his theater. The house, when complete, will be equipped with all the latest devices usually found in a high-class picture house, and will have a seating capacity of or about 350. Mr. Chambliss also reports playing to excellent business since the opening of the Lyric.

HOMER SIBLEY IN NEW OFFICES.

Homer W. Sibley, the booking agent for motion picture and small time houses, has recently moved to new offices in the Knickerbocker Theater Building, 39th Street and Broadway, New York, where he will continue to conduct his business as before, furnishing singers, musicians, lecturers and special features for the better class of motion picture houses. Mr. Sibley has recently added a stock company department to his business and is supplying complete dramatic companies for parks and theaters.

Putting On a Picture in Egypt.

Jack Clark, of the Kalem Players, Writes of the Trials and Tribulations of the Picture Maker in a Strange Land.

AMERICANS and others not to the "manners born," find the matter of getting about Egypt one of considerable difficulty. To go into that peculiar country for the first time and, densely ignorant of the manners and customs of its people, attempt to make motion pictures, should cause any but the resourceful picture producer to tremble. Yet, it was under just such conditions that Mr. Sidney Olcott ventured to invade Egypt with his little band of players and many interesting tales of the difficulties encountered and surmounted, of course, have filtered through in the occasional correspondence between the players and the Kalem Company's office. It is not hoped that the whole truth will ever be told, for such matters have come to be considered "all in the day's work" and are seldom recorded. A recent letter from Mr. Jack J. Clark, leading man of the El Kalem Company, gives something of what that company has had to contend with. Mr. Clark's letter was written at Luxor and is published herewith:

I think it was the Pharaoh, Rameses II, who, when his treasury was depleted, discovered that tying his wives in a sack and dumping them in the Nile was cheaper than paying alimony, and that he first copyrighted the expression, "Necessity is the mother of Invention." "Be that as it might," as Bob Vignola says, the truth of that trite expression was never exemplified, better, than in some of our experiences in the "Land of the Lotus Flower." For instance, a few weeks ago we were called to listen to the reading of the story we were to take next. A tale of Christian Missionaries among the savage tribes of Central Africa. Director Olcott in apportioning parts said, "Jack, you play the savage chief," and he showed me a picture of a tribesman of that locality. I took one glance and said, "Fine; I'll drop around to Hepner's in the morning and get a wig." Then there was consternation, for nothing like it could be found in the limited supply we had secured prior to our hurried departure from Gotham.

Finally Director Olcott, in the manner of a born "Captain of Finance" who says "Do this and it is did," said "Go-ahead, Jack; you and Bob get on the job, you can dig it up somewhere." And the nearest wigmaker probably two thousand miles away! Bob looked at me and I returned his gaze with interest. Then, despite our strict religious training, for fond mothers had brought us up to be shining lights in the priesthood, our thoughts took a sulphuric turn. In despair we adjourned to the wardrobe room and solaced one another with our respective opinions of Egypt, The Kalem Co., The Scenario, its writer, our esteemed director and everything in general.

Then we buckled down to devise some scheme of manufacturing it. We first tried crepe hair sewed on a tarboush. Decided that if we had about two miles of crepe hair and the patience of Job we might succeed, but having only two yards of the former and none of the latter we desisted. Then, in dazed despair, we mechanically fingered over the wigs and beards we had brought along to "Make Up" the characters in Biblical stories.

Suddenly, as if by hypnotic force, our mutual gaze focused on two objects that seemed to wave to us, like palms in an oasis to a thirst stricken traveler. They were the beards of Judas Iscariot and Nebuchadnezzar. "Eureka!" we exclaimed (that wasn't the word, but the other doesn't look well in print), "WE have it!" There they were, waving in the Nile breeze like a gladsome symbol of hope long, glistening, curly, black chin-pieces. In a minute Bob had them on my head, a brief scurry for hairpins, a few ostrich feathers and the job was done.

Julius Cæser entering Rome on his greatest triumph looked like an ice cream sandwich man in a January blizzard, compared to us as we entered Director Olcott's room. He took one look, then said, "Yes, that's it; I thought you'd get it," "Say, Ameen (to the dragoman), to-morrow I want nine donkeys, two camels, and——" "Oh, what's the use? Genius is never recognized until you are fifty years dead."

Then there is the question of studio. In Florida we were accustomed to an enormous stage, large flats and every facility for interior sets, but here "Shades of Cleopatra!" The scarcest thing in Egypt is lumber. The first time we had occasion to use an interior, Farnum, with Ameen, visited the local lumber yard, which is a mud building about forty feet square. For lumber longer than thirty feet, you must send to Marseilles. Upon passing the armed guard at the front door, they were met by a most suave proprietor. At his courteous invitation they seated themselves cross legged on the floor facing their host. A langorous wave of his hand and tiny cups of coffee were served, hot, thick and black. Then came "Turkish Delight," a form of candy popular here. After duly enjoying these, the courtly proprietor consented to discuss business. Through the interpreter, Farnam made known his wants. Then ensued about an hour's haggling in Arabic, with coffee every ten minutes until Allen was so doped he didn't know whether he was buying lumber or armour plate. Finally a mutually agreed upon price was quoted him. He nearly fainted. He figured, that at the rate given, it would cost about Four thousand Piasters (Two hundred dollars) to build a hen coop. He at length secured, for the modest sum of fifty dollars, enough lumber to make the frames for three flats. Another coffee and he was allowed to stagger out into the open air and, dazed, he headed homeward. Since then you have only to mention coffee and he will rear up on his hind legs and bark like a Scarab.

For some time afterward, he wandered around the grounds with a foot rule in his hand, muttering, "fifty cents a foot, fifty cents a foot," until we began to think that the heat had gone to his head. Then at lunch one day, he entered the dining room with a smile from ear to ear. That afternoon he explained to the assembled company how he could get ahead of the Egyptian "lumber trust."

Between the back of our villa and the rear walls surrounding the grounds, is a rectangular space of ground, about fifteen by thirty feet. At the end of this and at right angles to the wall is the building containing our bath rooms, etc. The walls being smooth and admitting of being painted, made excellent backings, while the doors and windows act in the same capacity in the set, by simply hanging the draperies on the outside. So it is a common occurrence now to hear Director Olcott call out to those not in the scene, "Stay in your rooms, the camera is running."

So far, it has acted as "A suite of rooms in the Luxor Winter Palace," "Two separate Turkish Harems," and is now being decorated as a "Pharaoh's tomb" of five thousand years ago.

And costumes—that's the funniest proposition of all. I've managed to get as much sport out of that as I did when I saw the "Athletics wallop the New Yorks" in the last "World's Series." (Mr. Clark is a native of Philadelphia.)

There are no clothing stores here and everything in that line must be made to order. One dressmaker in the place and she an English lady who speaks Arabic with a Cockney accent. She being overwhelmed with "Tourist work," it is very hard for us to secure her services. So I found myself compelled to seek among the native tailors for aid. Then the fun began. First a visit to the "Draper's shop" (how's that for deah old Londonese), in company with Ameen, in search of material. We enter and exchange greetings and wishes for the health of all our families, back three generations. After coffee my wants are made known. The proprietor hands down bolt after bolt of goods, fondling each one in a loving manner. The material selected, the price is asked. Then comes acting that would warm the heart of a Belasco. "Ah! 'Tis a beautiful piece of material, one the prophet himself would delight in wearing." "In fact he hates to sell it, but rather than cross the Effendi, he may take it at twenty Piasters the metre." This being translated I reply that "I don't want to pay off his mortgage," and offer him six. Upon hearing this, he casts his eyes to heaven, and in an agonized voice swears by the beard of his father that it cost him eighteen piasters the metre. We reiterate our offer and on his agonized refusal, we bid him a solemn farewell and leave the shop. We then walk a distance of a hundred yards down the street. Ameen invariably stops and speaks to an old Arab who sells candy, utterly obvious of the calls of the merchant from his door. In despair, he rushes after us and implores us to return, protesting to Allah that "If the Effendi were to leave his place in anger, it would bring down bad luck on himself and his shop." "Are we not his brothers?" "Have we not drunk the coffee together?" "Are we Greeks, that he should let a few piasters stand between our friendship?" "No: Let the Effendi take the lovely goods as Baksheesh." (a free gift). Well, we finally got the goods at eight piasters a metre.

I have often wondered what would happen if we went beyond the candy stand, in fact have been tempted to go farther to find out. What if some time the candy man had been taken sick and failed to report for duty. "Upon what trivial incidents do momentous issues depend."

A WESTERN WOMAN'S OPINION OF PICTURES.

From a Paper by Hattie M. Loble. Read at a Meeting of the Daughters of Confederacy, Helena, Mont., Tuesday, March 19, 1912.

Strange as it may seem, motion pictures have done much in cultivating the public. The year 1911 saw a number of natural developments in the growth of the "Silent Drama." Perhaps one of the most important of these is the tendency towards longer subjects. Films of more than one reel are no longer a curiosity and have been received with much favor. Ancient and modern history is brought back to our memory in an interesting way, while, were these same subjects to be put in a stage, the companies would be received with empty benches.

Dickens' "Becky Sharpe" and Julia Ward Howe's " Battle Hymn of the Republic" have been pictured in an instructive and impressive way. While it cost more than $100,000 to put on Dante's Inferno, just twice as much as to produce the play of Ben Hur, The Fall of Troy, The Crusaders, Cinderella, and a Tale of Two Cities have cost many thousands. As illustrating the progress of the "Silent Drama," the Milano Film Company, of Italy, which evolved Dante's Inferno, now announce the completion of Homer's Odyssey. This immense production evolved an expenditure of thousands of dollars and was two years in preparation. This will show that the picture play is being developed in a very high class scale as to authors, actors, and elaborateness of staging. The best plays are being chosen and the most eminent actors have succumbed to the inducements offered by picture companies. Among the celebrities who have become allies to the camera may be named McKee Rankin, Sydney Booth, Nat Goodwin, Charles Kent, Mary Fuller, and others. An English writer recently asked Bernhardt if she did not consider her posing for the camera a retrograde movement, to which she replied: "I am playing for posterity, Art is always Art, no matter where it is or what the environment. What would we all give if the art of our Rachel could have been preserved in this manner, and who does not regret that science and invention could not have been resorted to in the days of Keene and Garrick."

Perhaps the most important achievement is that "Salvini," whom Charlotte Cushman pronounced "the greatest actor the world ever saw," now over 80 years of age, has consented to produce his sublime portrayal of "Othello" before the camera. Among the many admirers of motion pictures are "Tetrazzini," the famous opera singer, and Professor Starr, of the Chicago University.

Professor Starr has pronounced "the moving picture" the highest type of entertainment in the world, and Mark Twain, shortly before his death, said: "The motion picture show makes me feel brighter, healthier and happier."

The "motion picture" is fast becoming a great factor in educational work. Do you remember how you used to brood over the crude pictures in the little old geography? And how you promised yourself that some day you would see these places of interest? If any one would have told you then that, in comparatively a short time, scenes of pulsing life, with all the action and color of the original events, would be flashed on the class-room wall, you would have talked of fairy tales and scoffed at the notion. Yet this is the latest and perhaps the biggest step in education. Already in New York City a movement has taken form to provide for the schools, colleges, churches, social settlement, and every center where education is an object, exhibitions of motion pictures. They are presenting in a fascinating way the most direct and exclusive information on given subjects. Instead of the "Declaration of Independence" being read in the old boresome fashion, the very men who gave life and force to the document by signing it, will seem to gather at an end of the class room. Already in our State at the Boulder School for the Deaf and Blind they have pictures which are being successfully used to teach the deaf and dumb the scenes of mining and agriculture.

One of the most fascinating uses made of the motion pictures has been to entertain and suggest normal thought to the insane.

I sat by the fireside dreaming of days of long ago,
And pictures seemed to form in the midst of the ember's glow
But faded e'er I could catch them, the coals to ashes died,
E'en as my hopes had perished and the heart within me sighed.

I left the dying firelight, and the lonely, cheerless room
And wandered down the avenue, seeking to lift the gloom
When I heard the sound of music, saw countless lights agleam
And suiting an idle fancy, I entered as in a dream.

I entered into darkness, but sudden, before my eyes
On a curtain of white, came pictures and I stared in mute surprise,
Pictures that world! In wonderment I quite forgot my pain,
Pictures that lived! And with them I lived my youth again.

The North, the South, the East, the West were all at my command;
The whole world came before me, at touch of an unseen hand.
Ah! the pictures by the fireside may fade and die away,
But those on the magic canvas live anew for me every day.

GEORGE ADAMS IN "HUMPTY DUMPTY" PICTURES.

Who in the amusement world does not know George H. Adams, the man who has made millions laugh in his evergreen rip-roaring "Humpty Dumpty"? The Photo Drama Company, 145 W. 45th Street, New York City, succeeded in inducing Mr. Adams to make his farewell performance of "Humpty Dumpty" before their motion picture cameras. Exclusive State rights are now being offered. "Humpty Dumpty" is in three reels, and particularly adapted for matinees, though the old folks will all be glad to renew their acquaintance with Mr. Adams, the American Grimaldi.

ODYSSEY PICTURES MAKE HIT IN LIMA, OHIO.

The Monopol Company is in receipt of a wire dated May 12th from the Central Feature Film Company, of Lima, Ohio, which reads as follows:

"Odyssey opened here to-day Lyric Theater, Shubert House, under management of McMahon and Jackson. Stood them out in street from 1 p. m. to 11 p. m. Picture conceded the greatest ever run here; steady, clear, amazing and thrilling. Congratulations on such a masterpiece."

Projection Department

Projection Machine Mechanisms—Part IV.

THIS week the entire department is given over to the fourth of a series of instructions which will cover the latest model of all leading mechanisms. The Powers Six was dealt with in the January 6th issue; the Standard, in the issue of February 3rd, and the Simplex, in the March 9th number. The Motiograph will appear very soon now; probably within two weeks.

The numbers refer to plates and parts, thus: 18758, P 1, means that part 18758, the gate latch, is shown on Plate 1. The list of parts given is official and parts may be ordered from it.

Instructions for Edison Model B Machine.

(Copyright 1912 by F. H. Richardson. All rights reserved.)

No. 1.—To Remove Adjusting Lever, 18047, P 1, unscrew same from adjusting gear shaft, 18052, P 2, by turning to the left several times.

No. 2.—Driving Crank, 18066, P 1, is secured to shaft by means of a spring catch and is readily released by pressing on the spring.

No. 3.—To Remove Adjusting Gear Shaft, 18052, P 2, and brackets, 18057 and 18058, P 2. Remove screws (four of them), 17585, P 2, which releases the entire bracket. To further take apart, or adjust, loosen collar set screws, 2798, P 2, which allows bracket, 18057, P 2, and adjusting screws, 2076, P 2, to be slipped off the shaft, after adjusting gear, 18049, P 2, has been loosened by means of driving out the straight pin which holds it to the shaft. Bracket 18058 also may be slipped off the shaft.

No. 4.—To Remove Gate, Together with the Assembled Parts Thereon. The gate is removed from mechanism by taking out hinge rod, 18193, P 1. If the gate sticks, tap gently until released.

No. 5.—Gate Guide Roller, 18204, P 2, and flanges, 18205, P 2, may be removed by driving out guide roller shaft, the part number of which is 18206. Use a punch and drive the shaft out toward the hinges of the gate.

No. 6.—Upper Film Guard, 18757, P 1, may be removed by taking out screws (two of them) 2798, P 2, on inside of guard. Do not attempt to remove the upper guard by removing screws, 20636, P 1, as they have nothing to do with the guard.

No. 7.—Gate Latch, 18758, P 1, may be removed by taking out latch screw, 20406, P 1, and upper gate stop screw and nut, 2782 and 18207, P 1.

No. 8.—Automatic Fire Shutter is removed by loosening screw 18779, P 1, and taking off collar, 18778, P 1. Next, loosen screw, part number of which is 8132, in the side of part 18789, P 1 (part 18789 is the nickelplated hub). This hub is a part of the clutch disc which holds the governor weights. You may then pull out shaft and mitre gear, 19411, P 2. The cover, 18791, P 1 and 3, may be lifted off by removing two flat head screws, 1841, P 1 and 3.

Having removed the shutter from the gate, you will see, on the inner end of the hub in which was shaft 18411, P 2, a brass collar. This collar is merely pressed on the hub, and is held there by friction alone. It can be pried off or removed with a pair of gas plyers. Having removed this collar, which is part No. 18785, you can lift off the shutter blade and weight, thus revealing a spider-shaped copper spring. This spring is for the purpose of holding the shutter blade away from the revolving mechanism after the shutter is locked open, thus eliminating considerable friction which would otherwise be present. It will be noticed that three of the prongs of the spring are bent upward, and three are flattened out against the metal. This is as it should be, since the spring must provide friction between the revolving part and the shutter blade part until the shutter blade has been raised. Do not bend the prongs, but leave them as you find them. This spring should be examined once in a while, since it will naturally develop some wear, which has the effect of allowing the metal revolving part to rub too hard against the shutter blade, thus causing undue friction. The governor may be still further disassembled by removing screws (two of them) 18795, P 1 and 3, which are in the head of the nickel plated hub of the clutch disc, 18789, P 1. These two screws have on their circumference small spiral springs, the part number of which is 18796. Be careful and do not lose these springs. Their use and purpose is as follows: When the semi-circular weights, which you will see when the cover is removed, spread open through centrifugal force, the part carrying the shutter blade is forced outward, toward the gate against the pressure of these springs, by the two little arms or levers on their inner ends. This has the effect of locking the fire shutter open when the machine has attained speed, so that all friction is removed. When the speed drops below the danger point, these leaden weights fall inward and the two little springs pull the central metal part, carrying the shutter blade inward again, thus unlocking shutter blade and allowing it to fall and shut off the light from the film.

No. 9.—Bracket, 18780, P 1, which carries the outer end of mitre gear shaft, 19411, P 2, may be removed by taking out one screw, the part number of which is 17587, which holds the foot of the bracket to the casting of the gate. Caution: The bracket is held square by two dowel pins, the part number of which is 18782, in addition to the screw. Be careful and do not bend these pins or you will have trouble.

No. 10.—Lower Guard, 18763, P 1, is removed by taking out two screws, 2801, P 1.

No. 11.—Lower Film Protector, 18666, P 1, and its support, or hinge, 18667, P 3, may be removed by taking out screws (three of them) 2798, P 3.

No. 12.—Spring 18672, P 3, may be removed by taking out hinge rod 18193, P 3. This also releases lower film protector, 18666, P 1. To replace film protector, 18666, P 1, its hinge rod, 18193, P 3, and spring, 18672, P 3, remove hinge, 18667, P 3, and replace the spring and hinge rod, afterwards readjusting the hinge, with its assembled parts, to the machine frame. The spring in question can be put back without taking off the hinge, but this is very difficult to do.

No. 13.—Gate Idler Roller, 17950, P 2, (end) and 17949, (body), P 2, may be removed by loosening the set screw in 17949, P 2. Gate idler roller bracket, 18766, P 2, and the spring which supplies tension to the bracket, may be removed by driving out shaft 18117, P 2, which holds same. To replace the spring which this shaft carries, place the spring in a straddling position over the center part of the roller bracket, with the two ends of the spring at the bottom, and the loop shaped part on top. Place the spring in the groove in the casting and press the bracket and spring down simultaneously, pushing the shaft through the bracket and spring and into its bearing at the other end, while holding the spring and bracket down with the other hand.

In case the spring does not exert sufficient pressure, grasp the loop at the top with a pair of plyers and pull it outward. This will have the effect of making the spring stronger in its action. See to it that the coils of the spring are close to the central portion of the bracket.

No. 14.—Mechanism Base, 18661, P 3, is held by four flathead screws which may be removed by turning the machine up-side-down.

No. 15.—To Remove Take-Up Sprocket Shaft, remove pulley, 19028, P 1 and 3, by driving out taper pin in its hub, being careful to drive it in the right direction or you will simply succeed in making the pin tighter, instead of removing it. If the machine is of the outside shutter type, then this pulley will be a chain pulley, as seen in P 4, and will be held to the shaft with a screw. Next loosen the screw in the hub of take-up sprocket 17992, P 2, and the shaft, 19739, P 1, and pinion, 18725, P 1, may be pulled out to the right. There is, or may be, a washer between pulley, 19028, P 1, and the boxing. Don't lose it and be sure to get it back in reassembling the parts. Back the screw in sprocket hub out considerable, as it is counter-sunk.

No. 16.—Upper Sprocket, Shaft, Pinion and Bracket. In order to remove shaft, 18106, P 1, and pinion, 18725, P 1, loosen set screw, 1714, p 2, in hub of upper sprocket, 17992, P 2, and remove same from shaft. Between the sprocket and the inner bearing of the shaft, will be seen set collar, 17932, P 2. Loosen the screw in this collar, after which the shaft and pinion can be pulled out from the gear side.

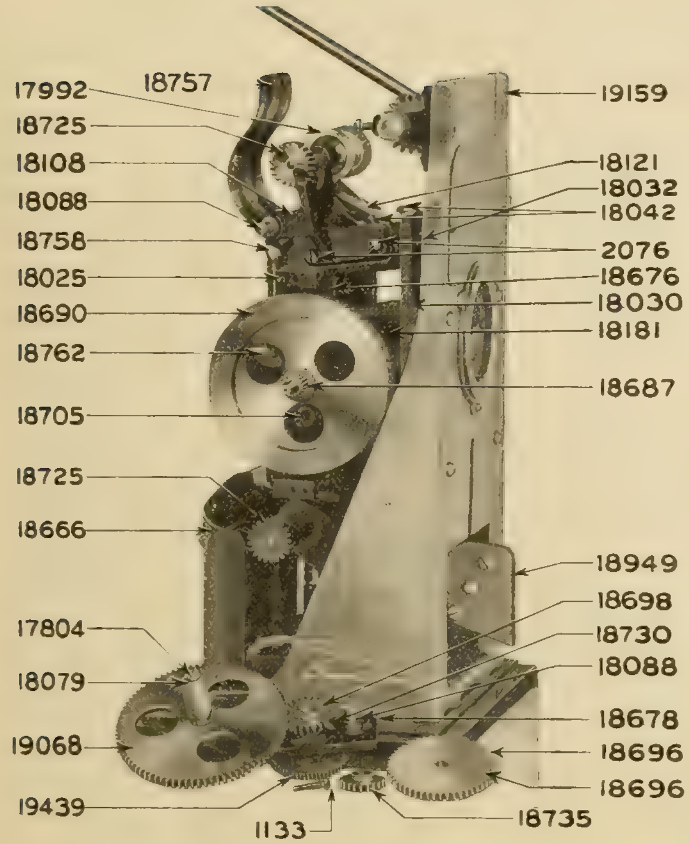

Plate 5.

No. 17.—The cast iron bracket carrying shaft, 18106, P 1, and gear, 18696, P 4, may be removed by taking out screws (2 of them), 2076, P 5. It may be necessary to carefully pry the bracket off after removing the screws.

No. 18.—To remove upper tension bracket, 18118, P 2, drive out the spindle which holds it, first having loosened the two screws which hold the flat spring bearing on the bracket. The idler, 17950, P 2, may be removed from the bracket by loosening set screw, 8114, P 2, in its center, and driving out the spindle.

No. 19.—To remove large intermediate gear, 18696, P 1, and second intermediate gear, 18735, P 1, it is only necessary to take out cotter pins, the part number of which is 18090, which hold them to their stud. Large driving gear, 19068, P 1, is held by a screw and washer, and may be removed by taking out the screw, the part number of which is 17804.

No. 20.—Cam shaft driving gear, 18740, P 1, and first intermediate pinion and its shaft, 18730, P 1, may be removed only after frame side cap, 18678, P 1, which is held by screws (2 of them), 1133, P 1, has been taken off. This cap is also held by 2 dowel pins, part number of which is 18025. It will probably be necessary to carefully pry the frame cap away after removing the screws. After the cap is removed the part may be taken off by driving out taper pin in the hub of first intermediate pinion, 18730, P 1, tapping it gently with a punch, if necessary.

No. 21.—Cam shaft bearing (long), 18691, which is in frame cap, 18678, P 1, just below gear, 18740, P 1, may be removed by loosening set screw, 18141, P 1, first having taken off the frame cap, as per instruction No. 20.

No. 22.—Tension springs, 18724, P 2, can be removed by taking out the two screws, the part number of which is 8424, which holds them. More tension may be supplied by sticking a screwdriver blade under the spring and running it up and down a few times, at the same time pulling outward. Be careful, however, and do not overdo this or you will either break the spring or provide too much tension, which is, in a way, just as bad as not enough.

No. 23.—To remove aperture plate, 18706, P 2, take out screws, 18180, P 2. Behind the aperture plate is upper film-guard, 18707, P 2, which may then be removed by driving out film-guard pin, 18187, P 4.

No. 24.—To remove cam shaft, 18684, P 2, and the parts assembled thereon, first proceed as per instructions Nos. 23 and 20. Next loosen set screw holding cam shaft bushing, 18692, P 3, and slip the bushing out. The shaft and its assembled parts, including mitre gear, cam, balance wheel and pinion may then be lifted away.

No. 25.—Mitre gear, 19409, P 2, may be removed by following instruction No. 24, after which drive out the taper pin, part number of which is 18683, holding the gear to the shaft. It will be necessary to force the gear from the shaft, using a copper or other soft punch and resting the end of the shaft on a block of wood.

No. 26.—To remove cam, 18138, P 2, follow instructions No. 24 and 25. Then drive out the pin in the flat surface of the side of the cam, which releases it from the shaft, and it may be driven off.

The re-assembling of these parts is merely a matter of reversing the process of their dis-assembling.

No. 27.—To remove intermittent shaft, 18113, P 2, and its assembled parts, take off lower film guard (apron), 18709, P 2. The same is held by two screws at its lower end. Next loosen set screws (2 of them), 18141, P 1 and 2, and remove eccentric bushings, 18705, P 3 and P 5. The shaft and its assembled parts, including the intermittent sprocket and star may then be lifted away.

No. 28.—The star, 18111, P 2, may be removed from its shaft by following instructions No. 23 and 27, and then driving out the taper pin, part number of which is 18172, from its hub.

No. 29.—Intermittent sprocket, 18702, P 2, may be removed from its shaft by following instructions No. 23 and 27, and then driving out the two pins which hold the same. In finishing these pins it sometimes occurs that they are not visible without close examination. You are cautioned, therefore, to look closely. Force sprocket off opposite end from star, as this end of the shaft is slightly smaller in circumference.

No. 30.—The revolving shutter shaft and mitre gear. In order to remove mitre gear, 19382, P 2, and its shaft, revolving shutter, 17934, P 3, must be taken off. Follow this up by removing cam shaft as per instruction No. 24, and the mitre gear and shaft can then be pulled out of its bearings. This applies to the inside shutter machine only. The outside shutter bevel gear and shaft may be removed in the same manner, however, except that the gear on its inner end is held in place by two screws which must be loosened.

No. 31.—The entire mechanism, that is to say, the part which frames up and down, may be removed from the frame by taking out the mechanism holding screws (4 of them), one of which is shown at 38, P 3 and 4, the other three being in corresponding positions, there being two on one side and two on the other. These four screws hold the mechanism to the frame.

No. 32.—The take-up casting, 18932, P 2, carrying the lower or take-up sprocket and its shaft, and to which is also attached the take-up arm, may be removed by taking out two screws, 17587, P 2.

No. 33.—Aperture plate, 18706, P 2, is supported by aperture plate bracket, 18181, P 5. This bracket is held in place by two bracket screws, part number of which is 18182. It sometimes happens that these screws work loose, in which case the aperture may vibrate, or may get out of place, and trouble will be produced on the screen. The remedy, of course, is to tighten the two screws. The screws supporting this bracket are in slotted holes and the position of the aperture can be shifted side-wise to a very considerable extent by loosening these screws. Should a picture at any time suddenly appear out of level on the screen, it is very likely that these screws have worked loose.

No. 34.—The revolving shutter shaft, carrying mitre gear, 19382, P 2, is carried by a bushing, the number of which is 19225. This bushing is readily removed by loosening the set screw in the side of the casting which holds it in place, first, of course, having removed the shaft as per instruction No. 30.

No. 35.—To remove lower sprocket idler bracket, 18940, P 2, loosen screw 2801, P 2, and the shaft, bracket and idler may all be pulled out. When you put the idler back, just slip the shaft, 18941, P 2, into place, allowing the idler to rest on the sprocket, and tighten up screw 2801. This will supply the required tension to the idler. If trouble is experienced with the film pulling over the sprocket, thus losing the lower loop, see to it that screw 2801, P 2, is set up tight, since otherwise the idler would not be held down on the sprocket by tension spring 18942, P 2.

No. 36.—Sprocket teeth. With the Edison machine, as with all other machines, the sprockets should be kept scrupulously clean. Dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket will cause the picture to jump, and dirt on the other sprockets will have a tendency to cause the losing of the loops. If you want trouble let your sprockets accumulate gum and dirt on their faces, and you will get it. An ordinary tooth brush, or some similar brush with short stiff bristles is best to clean them with, and they should be cleaned thoroughly at least once every day.

Never permit your sprocket teeth to become badly worn. Worn sprocket teeth are injurious to the film and are prolific of shaky, jumpy pictures. It does not pay to use them. The wise operator will have in his possession a complete extra cam shaft, with balance wheel, balance wheel pinion, cam and mitre gear, assembled thereon, as shown at B, Fig. X, all ready to slip into the machine on short notice. He will also have a complete star shaft, with intermittent sprocket and star assembled thereon, as shown at A, Fig. X, ready to slip into the machine. By this method, should anything go wrong with the intermittent movement, it is a matter of a few moments to re-equip the machine over with a new cam, or a new star, by slipping out the old part and installing the new. This plan has a further advantage that, instead of trying to install a new cam, star, or intermittent sprocket on the shaft, a job usually somewhat difficult of proper accomplishment outside of the factory, one can send the parts to the factory by registered mail and have them put on right. All operators are strongly advised to have these extra parts. It will save you much vexation and trouble, as well as being cheaper in the long run. The operator should, of course, also have extra bushings for both the cam and star shaft. It does not pay from any point of view to use worn sprocket teeth, particularly the intermittent sprocket teeth, or a badly worn cam, or star.

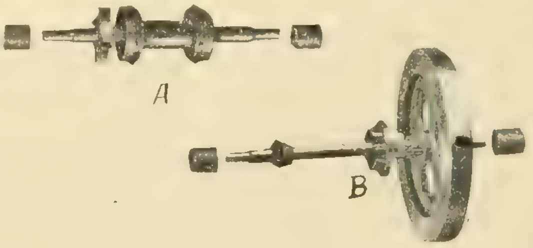

FIG. X.

No. 37.—Setting the shutter. To set outside revolving shutter, 19428, P 4, place shutter on its shaft with hub towards the mechanism. Have the lens in focus and place the shutter as close as possible without having its blades strike the lens. About one-quarter of an inch away will be right. Tighten up the set screw in shutter-hub, which engages with the groove in the spindle.

The two-wing outside shutter. To set the two-wing outside shutter proceed as follows: Place a piece of film in the machine. Loosen the three clamp screws on the front of the shutter, just enough to be able to turn the blade when he hub is held stationary. Now set one blade (either one) so that it covers the lens during the time the film is in motion. This can be determined either by looking through the aperture, by watching the intermittent sprocket, or by leaving the dowser down, lighting the arc light and allowing the light to filter through the mica dowser cap, which will, when the fire shutter is raised, project the picture to the screen, sufficiently plain for the purpose. After the blade is so set that no movement of the film is visible while any portion of the lens is uncovered, tighten up the clamp screws again, and the job is done.

The three-wing outside shutter. The three-wing outside shutter is set the same as is the two-wing, except that the wide blade is the one which cuts off the light. No attention need be paid to the other two blades, nor to the second blade on the two-wing shutter; they being merely a combined counter-balance and flicker blade.

The inside shutter. The inside shutter is set in exactly the same manner as is the outside, except that there are two set screws in the shutter hub, the loosening of which allows of the shutter being revolved on its shaft. No attention need be paid to the perforated shutter blade.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

Wants Free Cuts.

J. H. JAMES, of the Dreamland Theater, Salem, Ind., gives voice to the ideas of many when he writes:

> I have a feeling in my heart that the manufacturers should help the exhibitor. I feel that if they would furnish exchanges with a cut of a an actual scene in the reel, such as I am enclosing you, they could be used on hand bills and dodgers and make an attractive showing.
> As the manufacturers have to have cuts made of every release they put out, it would cost them little more to furnish one with each reel supplied the exchanges, which they, in turn, could loan the exhibitor, a fine of one dollar being imposed for failure to return the cut. I would like to have the opinion of other exhibitors, the exchanges, and yourself in the matter.

Just what the manufacturer should do for the user is something that has been agitated ever since the photoplay business began. Naturally the manufacturer thinks he does enough when he arranges for posters and supplies press suggestions, and offers to furnish cuts at reasonable prices. Some exhibitors think that since he is advertising the Blank or the Dash release the company boomed should contribute.

But suppose that one cut was furnished with each reel. John Jones wants the reel and the cut at the same time. He gets his film in the morning and the local shop runs off the stuff at once. Smith, on the other hand, can use cuts only if they come to him the day before. Brown wants his cuts a week or ten days ahead because he uses a weekly program. It follows that Jones, Smith and Brown may each want the same cut on the same day. In seeking to supply cuts the manufacturer finds that he has but begun. He must supply three cuts for each release.

A Matter of Runs.

To go further into the matter, suppose that Brown runs ten thousand programs. He uses a good grade of paper and has nice press work done. He gets the cut from Greene, who is in a small town with a job office run by a man and a boy, when the man isn't drunk. The cut may have been used for twenty or thirty thousand impressions already in other towns and is not in very good shape. The boy puts the form on the press, forgets to lift the gauge pins or quads from the platen and dents the cut. It comes to Brown with a hole in it, and all the press skill in the world will not give a good impression. Straightaway Brown begins a new campaign. A cut for each house.

It is very true that manufacturers have one or more cuts made for newspaper use in each release, but these are all fine screen, not at all suited for general work where from 60 to 120 screen is needed. The cut already made is of no use at all. A new original must be made with the proper screen from which the electros can be had.

Liberal as It Is.

Personally we do not believe that the point is well taken. Many of the companies already supply bulletins and other advertising matter that give the exhibitor valuable hints. The suite of press stuff sent out by Stanley H. Twist, the Selig representative, for "The Coming of Columbus," is very complete, with fifteen press stories, a full page reproduction from one of the Chicago papers and cuts in all sizes, styles and screens. The Kalem company is giving the exhibitor plenty of assistance in booming the Egyptian releases, the Vitagraph and Edison issue comprehensive booklets, and most of the Independent companies do the same. Most of these carry much material that can be used direct by the exhibitor and it is no exaggeration to say that two or three thousand dollars worth of free press work is given away each week.

More than this, the companies arrange for the publication of posters and, where the posters are not all taken up, stands the loss. The poster company makes the poster for the manufacturing company. They are charged for the bulk and credited with what are sold. It is the same arrangement as is made with dramatic managers and vaudeville stars. When exhibitors do not take the full run the company pays. Most of the companies supply cuts for features at a loss. We do not think that Mr. James offers a good argument. We don't believe that Mr. James stopped to realize how much the companies have done and are doing for the exhibitor.

At the Same Time.

Even at that we believe that some of the companies might very materially improve their press work if they gave more thought to what the exhibitor really needs. We think the items in the Kalem Kalendar the best stuff being done because it is the sort of thing that any editor will be glad to get. The Vitagraph material prepared for local newspaper work is apt to be flamboyant, and the Lubin notices are in the old-fashioned press agent style. The Edison Kinetogram ad work is almost too modest, and none of the others sound exactly the newspaper note. It is not enough merely to hire a press man. He should be shown what the exhibitors want or else find out.

Monty Is There.

And in this connection we want to say that a bundle of bulletins from E. H. Montagu, the European agent for the Selig company, shows snap and dash. The descriptions are supplied by the Chicago office, but there are good lines that can be transferred to the house advertising boards with little or no change. It is clean cut and effective work. It's all enthusiastic, as good house advertising should be, but it is convincing, as well. Some of the American press men might profitably study his work.

Here's Something Handy.

We have frequently advocated the ready printed program cover, and along the same line Arthur D. Jacobs, of the Exhibitors' Advertising and Specialty Co., sends in a lot of samples of a new bill that classes as two-color work at nothing like the two-color expense. The bills are printed up with a Klondike border by the hundred thousand, taking advantage of the single make-up for the long run, and the text is printed later in another color, four colors of borders giving wide latitude. The exhibitor has only to give the title of the feature reel or reels and other specific information such as prices, date, and hours, and the company does the rest, getting up the copy, obtaining cuts where possible, and looking after the display. The cost is $2.25 in thousand lots; $2 for two to four thousand, and $1.75 for orders of five thousand or more. They are printed on good book paper, which permits really good printing, and if you are not too far from 30 Union Square (they've gone around the corner and up the street a block lately), it's cheaper and better than going to the local printer. The border colors are red, green, brown and yellow, a contrast ink being used for the letter-press. One good feature is that the copy is prepared by an expert ad man and set by poster compositors.

What Wesley Says.

Wesley's latest contribution to the joy of Gardner, Mass., is a small white card, reading "Are you going to buy a drink?" on one side and the unescapable "Wesley Says So" on the other. It's not good advertising, as a rule, but Gardner just "went wet" after being a long time dry, and it took advantage of a purely local condition. As such it is good arvertising, if the cards are kept out of the hands of children, but at times it is tempting fate to put out this sort of work, though these were supplied only to the saloon.

Another card has numbers printed on the edge and in the center announces that

> No, this is not a
> MEAL TICKET
> but simply to remind you that GREEN'S MOVING PICTURES are at the GARDNER THEATER every afternoon and evening. Recognized to be the best.
> "WESLEY SAYS SO."

Almost anyone will pick up a meal ticket from curiosity if nothing else. A cheap punch with which to perforate some of the numbers would have helped the illusion along.

Wilson Is Convinced.

Carey Wilson, who seems to have a fondness for blonde hair, and who was convinced that there was no such thing as a one-reel feature, writes from the Criterion Theater, Rutherford, N. J.:

> Just a line to give credit where credit is due. I took a chance the other day and advertised Biograph's "The Lesser Evil," as the best single reel feature ever shown at the Criterion. By the way, I've been taking so many chances lately in the line of advertising that they have started to call me "Steve." Anyway I billed the Biograph way up as the real thing, just from the synopsis and the story and pictures in the "Motion Picture Story Magazine." (As another "by the way," this "Story Magazine" is a great help to the exhibitor in obvious ways.) In spite of the hasty, rainy night we had a corking big crowd and they went simply crazy over the picture. Personally I think it is the greatest single reel picture I have ever seen, and the work of the little blonde Bio girl was wonderful. There was none of the lack of attention to detail in this picture that I spoke of a while ago. The motor-boat chase worked up my audience to a regular frenzy, and the applause (not from children, mind you, but from a houseful of adults), was continual all through the latter half of the reel. I think a vote of thanks ought to be extended to Bio for this work, and I want to know what the name of the little blonde is. Do you happen to know?
> We are going to run "The Coming of Columbus" for two days here, the 20th and 21st of May. Am billing it big. Selig certainly gives us a lot of help with his press sheet, etc., in the "Columbus" envelope.

And Speaking of One Reels.

The Edison company has released the first of the Harry Furniss pictures ("The Artist and the Brain Specialist"), and has others to follow. Harry Furniss is known wherever English is spoken or caricature is enjoyed, and his engagement by the Edison company is something worth talking about. As the chief illustrator for London Punch, he stands the dean of the craft, and he has turned out a comedy that is amusing to the American mode of thought. Another Edison that should get more than usual attention is Bannister Merwin's "The Sunset Gun," the Decoration Day release issued May 24th.

Here's another pointer. It is very evident from the hundreds of questions that come to the Inquiry Departments of this and other publications that there is a keen interest in the wife of Maurice Costello, of the Vitagraph. The announcement of the Costello children in pictures was something of a shock to the hero worshipers, and the fact that Mrs. Costello herself appeared in "Her Crowning Glory" leaked out too late to do many of them much good. She is programmed for "Diamond Cut Diamond," the Vitagraph release for May 24th, playing the telephone operator. If you get the reel advertise the fact.

Took the Tip.

The Fairyland Theater, Anaheim, Cal., has taken the suggestion made in this department, that the feature reel be played up on the front page instead of a broadly general statement that the General Flm Co. supplied the service. This was about all that was needed to get it in line and the removal of the house data to the front page gives more space for the program.

If you have something good play it up where it will show. There is always some reel that is a trifle more attractive than the rest, and by putting this where it can be seen at a glance the full value of the circular is obtained.

Just to show that he knows how to use what comes his way Manager Fiedler took the last notice over to the Orange County Plain Dealer and obtained a big write up, because that well printed paper gets out the programs from its job department.

"Getting Back" Right.

Milo H. Tifft, of the Dreamland Theater, Oswego, N. Y., writes:

> The picture shows in Oswego have had some hard raps from the ministers and school teachers, but recently one of our most representative citizens, the Hon. J. D. Higgin, was made a member of the Board of Education, and he addressed the teachers at one of their meetings and praised the motion pictures very highly, making special mention of the Delhi Durbar pictures. Taking my cue from his speech, I extended an invitation to the teachers to a complimentary entertainment to the Superintendent of Schools, who accepted the offer. I had the enclosed invitations printed and one was sent each teacher as well as to many of our prominent citizens. I had my house full, including the editor of the leading paper (who is also postmaster), who never had visited a motion picture theater before. The entire Board of Education attended and I could give a lengthy list of other prominent persons. It was a splendid advertisement for the pictures and everything passed off very nicely. Before the entertainment closed the Superintendent of Schools called for a vote of thanks. That was the way I "got back" at those who had attacked the pictures, and I had had some raps from the Superintendent himself.

Neat and Effective.

The card is on white stock printed in blue and reads:

Complimentary
to the
Teachers of the Public and State Normal Schools of Oswego

AT DREAMLAND PHOTO PLAY THEATER
Saturday, May 4th, 1912, at Ten A. M.

The Following Educational and Topical Subjects Will Be Shown:
"Children Who Labor,"
"Pathe's Weekly"—Topical Subjects,
"Delhi Durbar."

You Are Most Cordially Invited to Attend.
39 West Bridge Street. MILO A. TIFFT, Manager.

This is very well done, but we think it would have been better had the card stated that it was good for two admissions.

Anything that will make the teachers photoplay fans is to be commended. They cannot well preach against the pictures if they know what they are and home argument against the photoplay is silenced by the assertion that "Teacher goes." It is rather too late in the season to do much good now, but plan a fall campaign. Pay a little money for a special program, make certain that the films to be sent are in good condition, and then pitch in. After the first entertainment is given, make a point of advising them whenever you are to have some special feature that might interest them. Their patronage is well worth having and it will take very little to rouse their interest.

Wants to Know.

M. P. Williamson, of the Arcade Theater, Attica, Ind., sends a program and this letter:

> Enclosed find copy of program as issued by me each Saturday, giving the releases for the coming week. I will appreciate any criticism which you may have to offer. It is the faults I want to know about that they may be corrected. For the benefit of those contemplating the use of a weekly program I would say that the advertising in my program makes it practically self-supporting. I will be glad to exchange programs with a few theaters, that we may make use of each other's ideas as regards form of make-ups, write-ups, etc.

Better Display Needed.

We like the manner in which Mr. Williamson writes up his films, but the typographical appearance of the program is somewhat against it. Only the front and back pages are bordered, the inside pages carrying two advertisements with a day's film between. Two point rule cuts off the text from the advertising, and the distinction is not enough. The booklet is rather small, 4 by 6, with the ads one and a quarter inches each with two and a quarter inches for the program. It is not easy to tell where the advertising stops and the program begins. It would be a good idea to box the program completely in with two-point rule, making certain that the mitres join properly. If this is done and a bold face type used for titles, the titles being of a larger sized type than the dates, the appearance will be improved. Twelve point titles and ten point dates would be better than the reverse, and boxing in would further serve to throw the program part into prominence. There is a tendency to crowd the display in the advertisements, due to an effort to get a three-inch advertisement in the space. The advertisers should be educated to say less or take more space. The press work is better than the composition and the paper is plenty good enough.

An Exchange of Ideas.

The suggestion of exchanging ideas is a good one, and is passed on to the readers of this department. This department cannot show actual samples and these sometimes are helpful. We can give suggestions as to display that may prove helpful to the printer, and reproduce some of the best catchlines and phrases, but this is about all that it is possible to do, though we are thinking quite seriously of reproductions of some of the samples in miniature.

Rule Work Here.

Mr. Williamson might get in touch with Nat Holt, of the Novelty Theater, Stockton, Cal. Mr. Holt sends in a four-page weekly, all his own, that makes good use of three on six point border. If the lock-up was more carefully done, the fact that the border is made up of two and four-em pieces would be less apparent, and the looks of the sheet would be improved, but the idea is there, and three on six point border is to be found in almost every office.

Mr. Holt writes that he believes in getting the most out of a film, and part of the getting consists in getting the advertising out right. The use of several sizes of type permits him to get the most out of his lines, and while finical printers might regard the pages as being a little too "black" they are not too heavy for advertising display. Mr. Holt uses a page for every three-a-week change with a front page cut for some feature.

An underline on the front page announces the first children's matinee under the auspices of the club women of Stockton, which should offer a suggestion to other managers. If the good ladies of your town still cherish the idea that pictures are hurtful, see to it that they get a chance to see some good ones and then suggest a special matinee for the Kiddies under their control. They're liable to be a nuisance about the house for a time, but they'll give you a standing that is a lot better than sensational talk in the club meetings and private condemnation in the homes.

Mr. Holt gets a lot on a rather small sheet and in the issue sent shows that he is aware of the effective use to be made of an occasional stock cut when it is handy. He even finds room for nine lines of personal gossip about the players. It all makes for a rather full page, but we've an idea that we'll find him with an eight or twelve page program soon with outside advertising to cover the cost.

Columbus Advertising Wanted.

Will you kindly send in your advertising for the Columbus release when you get the reels. If you do not care to submit it to criticism make that fact known, but the writer is curious to see just what will be done with the equipment furnished by the company.

KALEM EGYPTIAN FEATURES.

Furnish Entertainment for a Large Gathering of New York Exhibitors.

In the face of a driving rain storm, scores of exhibitors from different sections of Greater New York found their way to the Auditorium Theater on West Twenty-third Street, Thursday morning, May 16, to attend a private exhibition of "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" and "Missionaries in Darkest Africa," the first of a series of Oriental feature subjects to be released by the Kalem Company. By eleven o'clock the theater was filled and as the first scenes of the spectacular drama with the striking backgrounds of ancient Egypt unfolded themselves, the guests felt amply repaid for braving the severe weather. Mr. F. J. McAloon, publicity manager for the Casino Enterprises in Massachusetts towns, was an interested spectator.

One of the features of the exhibition was the rendition of special music which Kalem has had prepared for these productions. The composer, Mr. W. C. Simon, presided at the piano and the weird strains that accompanied the incidents on the Sahara Desert and the trials of the missionaries in the African jungle were very impressive.

Between the first and second reels Mr. William Wright, of the Kalem Company, made a few timely remarks, calling attention to the fact that Kalem Company has already expended $75,000 on the Oriental company, whose first production is now being released. He announced that the special music which they had enjoyed during the exhibition of "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" and "Missionaries in Darkest Africa" could be secured for 25 cents—a complete piano score—and that special one, three and six-sheet four-color lithographs, made from actual photographs of scenes in "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" and "Missionaries in Darkest Africa" are to be obtainable from exchanges, the A. B. C. Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, and distributors.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

THE PHOTOPLAY MARKET.

HERE are some more reports from the photoplay makers as to their present needs.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPH CO. (Lew Dougherty, Editor), 11 East 14 street, New York City. The season on the Pacific Coast is drawing to a close and no more scripts will be considered until after June 1, when the company will return to New York. They buy little outside material, preferring to deal with authors established in their favor. Licensed.

ESSANAY COMPANY. (Norman Macdonald, Editor), 1333 Argyle street, Chicago, Ill. Buying very little at present, but can use a few comedy dramas and seacoast stories. All scripts should be sent to the home studio.

G. MELIES. (C. Whiting, Editor), West Main street, Santa Paula, Cal. Wants Western drama and melodrama, Mexican plays, Rural and Mountain stories. Must be small casts and mostly exterior scenes. Licensed.

Meaning Us, Perhaps.

The Photoplay Enterprise Association gives these details of its book on photoplaywriting in the June issue of The Motion Picture Story Magazine:

> This book contains one hundred and twenty-four pages and is six by nine inches in length and width—quite different from the pamphlets being issued and purporting to be an anthority on the art of scenario writing.

We have not read these six by nine pages, but possibly their reliability may be judged by some of the other statements made in the advertisement which blithely states that "The following companies are paying from $50 to $75 for all scenarios which they accept: Reliance, Lubin, Edison, Bison, Vitagraph and Selig. The other companies pay from $50 to $35 for acceptable scripts."

If this is the sort of information that is contained in those six by nine pages we do not think much of it.

Technique of the Photoplay contains fifty printed pages and is 5⅜ by 7⅝, but it is set in eight-point type and contains all the information that is necessary to the writing of good photoplays. It is purposely kept brief for handy reference. It does not "purport" to be an authority on photoplay writing. It is.

Lubin—Los Angeles? No.

Those who have lately sent scripts to the Los Angeles studio of the Lubin Company are receiving their mail back from the post office as unclaimed. This applies, of course, only to the scripts sent to Los Angeles.

What It Means.

A correspondent sends in a printed slip from the Biograph company, which reads: "We are not purchasing scripts at the present time and will not purchase any for several months," and wants to know what it means. The last time we asked we were told it was a polite way of telling people whose work does not suit not to send in any more.

Royalty Here.

A correspondent states that the Pacific Motion Picture Co. of Los Angeles returned his script with the statement that they were making only state rights films and wanted two or three-reel features on a royalty of $5 a reel. We do not know the company, but the statement may interest some of the photoplaywrights.

The National Is Returning.

The many inquirers who have vainly queried this department regarding scripts sent the National Film Distributing Co., and which they vainly sought to have returned, are informed that one writer got his material back and perhaps they may have the same luck if they are persistent.

But why bother about a company that refuses to return scripts in the face of return postage and polite requests? Keep your carbons and, after a decent interval (say of three months), notify the company they must not use your story, have the carbon taken over onto white paper and submit it to some other company.

Why?

A correspondent seems aggrieved because he sent some scripts to G. M. Anderson and can't get them back. We do not see why. The Essanay company never asked that scripts be sent direct to Mr. Anderson; it never has announced that Mr. Anderson asked for scripts, but to the contrary it has asked that scripts be sent to the Chicago office (when it was asking for scripts), and we fail to develop a proper amount of sympathy for a man who sends scripts to California that he is asked to send to Chicago. The California section maintains no photoplay department or editor to return this material, and personally we do not blame Mr. Anderson for not returning this unsolicited contribution. A lost script should be the penalty of a downright violation of company rules. Play according to the rules or give place to those who will.

In Comedy, Too.

In a recent issue of The Moving Picture World L. G. Coover gave good advice when he warned photoplaywrights to keep away from the dramatic theme that was apt to make trouble between producer and the censors, but we think he is wrong in closing with the advice to "remember the censors—or try comedies."

That is the time of all others when care should be exercised. We have just set aside a comedy that is nothing more than a polite exposition of marital infidelity. Worse still it was written by a woman who probably did not realize how crude was her work. It has been our experience both as a fiction and photoplay editor that the woman who writes of sex relationships does so largely from hearsay evidence, because the woman who knows knows better than to write unsalable stuff.

Clean comedy is even more essential than clean drama. The situation may excuse transgression in a drama that would be inexcusable in comedy, yet the comedy story based on infidelity is painfully plentiful in the editor's script drawer, even if it so seldom gets upon the screen. Beware of the censors, but don't get the idea that the fact it is a comedy will help you any.

Easy Money.

We had two letters in the mail last week. One was from a fiction and photoplay writer. The other was from a photoplay department editor passing on to us some of the stuff he had gathered through answering advertisements in the mail order magazines.

The first correspondent is Hugh King Harris, of Grand Rapids, and he writes:

> In regard to your Moving Picture World discussions of the Editor's attitude toward authors of photoplays will say I have no cause for complaint. All I ever learned of photoplay writing I got from pointers furnished by the film companies themselves, and I have had some of the leading Licensed concerns go so far as to return scripts with the suggestion that I make certain changes outlined, and then these were accepted. As a magazine writer I have never had this happen with stories I have written.
> Allow me to say I appreciate to the uttermost your department in The Moving Picture World and have received much encouragement and help from same. I am a writer for newspapers, magazines, etc., and successful. My photoplays are taking hold well and I think the field for earnest, careful workers, with real ideas is good, but I deplore the fakirs who advertise for easy game. You can not say too much against the pirates who would get easy marks interested, to the detriment of those who are capable and have to buck against a lot of scripts from photoschool graduates.

If the photoplay schools were conducted by men who knew or the books were written by those qualified to teach, there would still be the evil of the misleading advertisement, but it is very apparent that most of those who conduct these schools and some of those who have written books have no real knowledge of the profession they are supposed to teach. The books are less hurtful than the schools, since they are generally inspired by some more authoritative work and the harm comes from the fact that being garbled they are either incomplete or, in changing the text to evade copyright infringement, the meaning has become twisted.

The schools are another matter, since they issue lesson sheets and map out courses that depend largely upon imagination. Some few of those who conduct the schools are competent, but at least one man has admitted that he never even tried to write a photoplay himself.

Worse still is the newest class of humbug who announces that he will dispose of your script and you can pay him when you get your check from the company. There is no examination fee; you send your script in, and if it does not suit you are told it will be sent back. When you get it back it is accompanied with a suggestive circular that encourages you in the belief that by taking a course you can get not only that but your other scripts in shape to command from $50 to $100.

One of these circulars is issued under the heading of "My proposition," and in it the advertiser announces that he will dispose of song lyrics, vaudeville sketches, burlesques, dramatic works or fiction. He wants a preliminary fee of $10 or $15, but this is marked out in rubber stamp, which states there is "No fee for examination."

To the man who knows the song lyric proposition is enough to damn the rest. There is not a single company in the United States to-day offering to place song melodies or lyrics for beginners that is square and honest in its business dealings. This is a pretty broad statement, but the writer knows what he is talking about.

The writer of this alluring advertisement makes the further announcement that fully 50 per cent. of the vaudeville acts produced are placed through his office—a statement that is worse than absurd. It is an insult to the intelligence. If the advertiser can utter such deliberate untruths about two phases of his business, it is evident that all of his stuff is similarly false.

You do not have to have a broker to sell your scripts. There is not a broker in the country who has any better chance than you to sell material to photoplay producers than you have, and some of them have less chance, since they are marked in certain studios.

If you have it in you to write a photoplay and can write it in reasonably good technical form, you do not have to have the assistance of anyone in making a sale. Do not contribute to the bank account of the man who assures you he can sell anything from a photoplay to a ten-act drama. Do it yourself.

Funny, But True.

This letter from M. F. Burt, of St. George, Staten Island, is given partly because his stuff is amusing, but more because he takes an optimistic view of a pessimistic situation and hits a lot of truths squarely between the eyes. His style reminds us somewhat of the late George Francis Train, but like the philosopher of Madison Square, he goes to the root of things. It's good for directors to read, too. Here it is:

> Overjoyed to hear something on "Camera Limitations."
> Have served my time as "a actor." Chose Art as a profession and am a member of a National Society.
> Have been studying problems attached to scenario writing—great field and noble medium. Banked my house last winter with rejection slips, but am doing well though. Discouraged? NEVER. Success may be later. Thank you. Art is long.
> Sherman must have written photo plays.
> Some producers are discouraging; same impediments we are finding in other branches of art. Finer technique essential to great ensemble. Great fight.
> M. P. W. issues are bully, helpful and fair. Hope you live forever.
> I'd fight a dog for some producers! Others—oh my!
> Have spent hours in prayer with Mr. Producer hoping to get finer standard of character and simpler composition. Sometimes prayers answered, other times not. Liable to be sent to hospital. Don't care. A good cause.
> Great many times put off by "Camera Limitations." Don't want to run other people's business, but should have the right to create my own characters.
> Camera limitations good and true. Have respect for camera, but don't want Indians to stand knock-kneed either. Can't see what this has to do with limitation business. What is wanted is more character, less feathers and poseurs. Sensitive over this—was born in tall timbers.
> Lamed myself for a month showing characteristic walk of man used to snow-shoes. Later actor "clicked" at every step; had no life insurance either. Am not naturally a profane individual. Never struck a poor old camera in my life. Never will!
> AGAIN wanted artistic effect. Top of Indian teepes showing above early morning mist. (Can get effect at any lakeside.) Scene produced vividly inartistic.
> Am I at all discouraged? WHY, CERTAINLY NOT!
> Always shiver when I see canoeists canoeing on both sides of a canoe. Punk Indians. No true atmosphere—style "old Hudson River School of Painting" with apologies to Hudson.
> Never saw a real Indian slobber over a squaw. Causes me to omit Patchogue, L. I., from my vacation schedule.
> Would be asked to leave the theater if I could have the joy of seeing a canoe landed properly on a lake shore—invariably shown landing nose on. Must strain purses of producing company, as well as canoe.
>
> Talked like an undertaker to a Mr. Producer and man concerning not what to take, but the fine things to leave out. Same old limitation stuff. Surprised when he photographed unlimited things. Producers argument on a par with "Fine for the Professor," in last issue of M. P. W.—"eye and ear movement preparatory to scenario writing."

May 6th, 1912.

Some producer's ideas of wilderness, a bunch of trees and a lake with a be-feathered Indian caught red-handed in act of paddling a canoe in the foreground. More feathers, more wilderness. Suggests old-fashioned postage stamp and maps showing why Columbus came over here.

Spent three happy weeks on a "Western." Should have written it in three hours. Scene 3 brought the camera close to get big production with few in cast. "After the Massacre,"—11% smoke and 1% cast. Few "dead" lying about under small salary.

Wanted to produce big sand storm effect by exploding mounds of sand and dust on windy day. Have done it before. Representative told me it would take a lot of sand. It did. He didn't have any. FINIS.

Musicians playing 'cellos without conveying an impression of music,—and hundreds of other misrepresentations, all details but things essential in other branches of pure art.

Fifteen minutes of proper coaching would have secured the proper atmosphere. Hope this defect was not laid to "Camera Limitations."

Study productions all the time—see some splendid results,—mighty high in art, too. Hurrah! Bet they could have done it with a pin-hole camera.

Future of motion pictures astounding in possibilities: without doubt the greatest instrument of education. Wish this statement were original.

Have met splendid fellows in profession.

Couldn't count courtesies extended to me.

On Dithyrambic Discord.

"Accepting your invitation to 'Come On In,' I sit me down at my old reliable L. C. and express my opinion of the obnoxious 'kickers' who are forever taking up valuable space with their howls of dissatisfaction. Have been taking the World for many 'moons,' and buying it just for two reasons: Because of its Photoplaywright page and the Review of the Films, but frankly, am getting disgusted with the many 'rubes,' 'junk peddlers,' etc., etc., who are forever calling themselves 'writers' and kicking against editors, producers and everything else connected with the business, when the fault is all their own because they don't understand the first rudiments. That is evidenced by their continual insults to the editors, and their invariable neglect of the necessary postage. That fact alone stamps them as amateurs of the first water. The editor can read the story without opening the envelope—it's all on the outside.

"Cease this eternal 'howling,' 'wailing' and 'gnashing of teeth.' Take the Kindergarten Course in the writing game and learn the postal laws, weights, etc., and you will quickly note the fact that the editor is your friend, instead of the 'thieving, mean and rascally enemy' you accuse him of being.

"In my time as an author of short stories, articles, humorous verse, 'alleged' comic sketches, popular songs, and last but not least, photoplays (which means about eight years of writing), I have yet to have my first idea stolen, or a manuscript defaced in any way. In fact, I can't recall an instance where I have been compelled to rewrite a page through an editor's carelessness. Think that over, you 'kickers,' and it won't take you long to figure out where the trouble starts. I would never for a moment think of sending out a manuscript without weighing it carefully, and if there is the least bit of doubt, give the benefit to the Government—it needs the money. I have sent out hundreds of manuscripts, have 'regrets' from every publication and photoplay editor of any consequence in this country, but behind every 'acceptance' and every 'regret' I have invariably found a Gentleman—or a Lady.

"From whence cometh this wail of dithyrambic discord? Why simply from the embryotic and the uninitiated. They get an 'inspiration,' a sudden fire of 'genius,' spend about 'steen minutes in putting it on paper and rushing it out as a masterpiece of photoplay construction, and if it happens (which is often the case) that later they see something on the screen, they put on their 'war paint' and yell 'stop thief!'

"Let me tell you something. Only last month I had a couple of these same great 'inspirations'—those headline photoplays which editors pay $100.00 for (?) but instead of rushing them on paper, I waited till the perspiration simmered before I put them on paper. The result was that happening to stroll into a theatre I saw a fac-simile of one of my 'great' ideas, and later read the other one in a review of the films right here in the World. Did I yell 'thief?' Not on your scenario! I took off my hat to the fellow who was 'on his job' and got there first. Now that is what happens when you yell 'thief!' How much more convenient it is to look the films over and read the reviews, than to waste time writing something which has been used before and you didn't know a thing about it. And to add to this, you kick because some editor is kind enough to ask you to send the necessary postage. Do you know what would happen if you tried to 'butt in' and enter the magazine field with such stunts as postage due and calling honest authors 'robbers?' Why you would either be arrested for surplus imbecility, or else it would keep us busy twelve days out of a dozen writing notes to the editors and trying to locate your manuscripts.

"Yours for peace in the family,
"Chas. H. La Tourette."

Another of Those Laughs.

Here is a letter from a photoplaywright who wants to know these things:

> I read in your page about the injustice of the writers. Is it fair for those companies to make such a fuss over a two cent stamp when the writer gives them the right to read his script? What would they do were it not for the writer? Another thing: what is the reason why they will try to jew a writer down on his script when they can later sell it over themselves to some magazine such as the Motion Picture Story or the Photoplay?

The writer also seems assured that all companies have three or four editors and should not take thirty days to read a script, while he argues for a typewritten slip instead of the printed form. He also forgets to tell who he is or where he comes from.

The reason some of the companies make a fuss over a two cent stamp is that the stamp is apt to be more valuable than a script from a genius who doesn't know enough about the game to keep his postage properly paid. And believe us, dear friend kicker, the companies do not sell the stories to the magazines in question. Quite the reverse, in fact.

The argument that the companies should be willing to pay the postage for the sake of reading the script is foolish. The companies can get along without the photoplaywrights much better than the authors can get along without the companies.

Miss Cleo Ridgeley, Charming Ingénue of the Rex Company.

Comments on the Films

"JUST MARRIED" (Lubin), May 16.—An amusing farce with much freshness, although it contains a few old "gags." The audience got some hearty laughs. A newly married couple who are quarreling already, a couple of hungry but happy, careless thespians and the landlady, together with cops, children and citizens who join in the chase, play the picture. Some good trick photography adds to the fun. The camera work is very good.

"ALL IN THE WASH" (Lubin), May 16.—A married man's laundry gets mixed with that of a pretty actress who isn't at all bashful. The man's wife doesn't like it. The farce made good laughs. We haven't seen such poor photography from the Lubin people in months.

"THE GREATER LOVE" (Vitagraph), May 17.—A western sheriff and bad man story with a girl in it whose love makes the bandit human. The story is fairly dramatic and is told in a straight forward, clear way. There is a pistol duel in the mountains between the bad man and the sheriff who is chasing him. Both are on horseback. This is fresh and very commendable. It is extremely well photographed and is the best thing in the picture. The camera work is serviceable. Miss Edna Fisher plays the girl; Fred Burns is the sheriff; Robert Thornby is the bandit, and Charles Bennet plays the girl's father.

"UNDER THE SWAY" (Eclipse), May 15.—A picture dealing with hypnotism and with a situation arising from a good man's falling in love with an innocent girl who is "under the sway" of a schemer who makes her hand out her mother's jewels to him. The lover frees her by shooting the burglar. There is an incident something along these lines in Hawthorn's "The House of Seven Gables," but it is, nevertheless, a morbid subject. It is pretty effectively handled in this picture. The acting is good. Some of the scenes are beautiful pictures.

"SCENES IN KENT, ENGLAND" (Eclipse), May 15.—This travel picture, on the same reel, is a beautiful offering. It shows the old buildings of cities in the English Dukedom of Kent; the street scenes and other views. It is a very desirable picture.

"A PERSONAL AFFAIR" (Edison), May 15.—The Edison Company seems to have utilized its entire force almost in this certainly successful showing of what it can do in the farce comedy line. We saw the picture at the Herald Square Theater where it was well put over by the sound man and pianist, and we heard one man somewhere back of us remark "That certainly is funny." It is set, mostly, in the Pennsylvania Railroad Station in New York City. The situation is of the slightest; it comes when three young men and three young girls, not knowing each other, play, at the same time, with the "personal column" of some newspaper. Each party comes to watch and have a laugh. They do, so does the audience. Slight as it is, it develops a score of unsuspected, whimsical happenings and natural croppings out of mirth. The camera work is good.

"THE SWASTICA" (Melies), May 16.—The swastica is a holy sign among the Indians and it means under the eare of the Great Spirit. He who wears it is safe even among enemies. The producer has used this to make an effective picture, one that the audience watched with deep interest. It tells how a young Indian, in love with a white girl whom he knew was in danger, stole up behind her, choked her into insensibility and cut with his knife the swastica on her forehead. Later, he is captured by the sheriff and put into prison. She is captured by the Indians, and held for ransom until they find the mark under her hair and set her free with reverence. The situation is worked out with a fair measure of dramatic consistency and is pretty effective. The pictures serve very well to make the story clear.

"LEAP YEAR PROPOSALS" (Vitagraph), May 16.—A Bunnygraph that made much laughter. Bunny proposes to Miss Lilian Walker and gets the merry "mit." Miss Flora Finch proposes to him and he has her shown the door. He then dreams a nightmare in which this lady, in every conceivable way, pesters the life out of him.

"A PAGE IN CANADIAN HISTORY" (Vitagraph), May 16.—This is not a story at all, but a companion piece to the Vitagraph pictures of President Taft and his Cabinet, recently released. It shows views of Toronto, the capital of Canada, with good pictures of H. R. H., the Duke and Duchess of Connaught also a good picture of Princess Patricia, also many other dignitaries and high officers of state in the Dominion. It is a very commendable, excellent film. The audience seemed thankful for it.

"THE VAGABONDS" (Selig), May 16.—A good, effective tract; it pictures the life of a tramp downward from good estate to rags and tatters, through drink. The leaders are taken from some well-written poem. The narrative is told, for drinks, by an old vagabond in a barroom to a young man just starting out on the hard, bitter path. We have no doubt that these pictures do the world much good. The audiences seem to welcome them. They are sermons; but, if one knew it, good sermons are one of the most popular things in the world. The photographs serve very well; some of them are very good.

"A SOUL RECLAIMED" (Essanay), May 16.—This is another drink picture; but it is not a tract. Its heroine is a very pretty woman who is much addicted, but never seen drunk; there is no vulgarity in it. An artist paints her picture as a Madonna and it is hung in a church. One day, passing the church, he meets her and takes her in to see it. She becomes a nun. Any clear statement of this situation could hardly help being effective. Some of these scenes (the slattern, garret room and the bringing of the infant to the studio) are very well done indeed. All the scenes are restrained and commendable. The man who painted the picture was no artist. The producer would better have let the camera man make paintings for him. The Essanay Company has a good camera man.

"THE WOODEN BOWL" (Lubin), May 13.—A picture that pleases through the heart-interest in its situations rather than through any dramatic strength. It teaches a good homely lesson mordantly; but the producer, with fine artistic common sense, has set it apart from ordinary life by costuming it–so as to give it a Delft atmosphere, as though it were a sort of fairy tale told on a set of plates. This doesn't weaken the story and makes the moral acceptable. Otherwise it might have seemed a bit too much like just a tract on the inhumanity of treating age-weakened parents as though they were only children. We recognize Mr. Arthur Johnson through his make-up as the granddad who was apt to drop his china bowl, and also Miss Lottie Brisco as the daughter-in-law. We think the son, in his Dutch wig, is Mr. Mitchell. All do very acceptable work, as does the little boy who pitied the granddad, perhaps a bit too much for naturalness, when his parents made the wooden bowl. Photography is as usual.

"HIS LESSON" (Biograph), May 16.—Here is another tract; but one that is in part very artistic. It has good acting and a very tense climax with breathless suspense. One scene seems over-careful in its plainness. The effect is as though one were reading in words with divided syllables. It deals, as all good tracts must deal, with a homely, simple and very human situation and presents it to us very effectively. It is almost universal in its appeal. The husband runs his farm; his wife keeps the house, does the cooking, washing, cleaning, sewing, churning and what not. The husband is ambitious and hard-working; but he is not affectionate. He is saving money and laying up for himself, his children, and perhaps his grandchildren, a good reputation and a hard heart. His wife is more human than he, is of finer fibre, has needs that he won't recognize and is being mercilessly worn out. The man gets a sharp lesson and profits by it. The picture ought to go home to a good many people. It is pretty well photographed. We liked it; the audience also seemed to like it. The lesson comes through a sportsman on a fishing expedition, who stops several times at the farm house and wants the woman to run away with him.

"RANCH GIRLS ON A RAMPAGE" (Kalem), May 15.—Led by Miss Ruth, the dariest devil of them all, the Bar X bunch, all girls, go for a day's jamboree to the seaside resort and shoot the shoots and the cops too. It is well photographed and seemed to give entertainment to a good sized house.

"EGYPT, THE MYSTERIOUS" (Kalem), May 15.—On the same reel is this picture of the Kalem Oriental scenes. These are very valuable pictures; they are deeply interesting and instructive. The camera work, as in others of the series, is very good.

"ORPHANS OF THE PLAINS" (Pathe), May 15.—A good specimen of the typical Western, cowboy and Indian picture. It certainly pleased a large part of the audience very much. It is conducted well enough to be emotional and very effective. The Indians attack the stage and kill all but one little girl who escapes, and one badly wounded frontiersman, who sends the cowboys on a punitive expedition. There is plenty of gun smoke both ways and plenty of wild riding. The picture's freshness comes from the sad plight of the little white girl, left an orphan, and of her friend, the little Indian boy, who was made an orphan by the cowboys, rather wantonly. It is a rough, elemental picture, aimed to stir the savage nature that still lives in all of us, in the reviewer, at any rate. He doesn't commend that savage in him, though, not wholly. The camera work is good.

"THE SPIDER'S WEB" (Vitagraph), May 14.—The characters in this picture play for the sake of portraying a clearly set forth situation. There is no lead in it; every role seems to be equally important and all are filled extremely well. Mr. Costello plays a young lawyer, son of a fairly rich elderly business man (Mr. Eldridge). Three swindlers (played by Van Dyke Brooke, Earl Williams and Harold Wilson) have got him involved in a bogus mine and innocently he has permitted himself to be made president of it. The "bubble" bursts; the swindlers bribe the butler to rob him of the only evidence that can clear him and are making him the scapegoat; but the son, the lawyer, by his astuteness, gets a confession from the servant and, in the trial, discomforts the villains. Miss Zena Kieffe, as the daughter of the old business man, brings much charm of personality and acting into several of the scenes. The photography and general handling of the pictures are excellent. It makes a very interesting release.

"HONOR AND THE SWORD" (Lubin), May 18.—A picture suggested perhaps by a play that was popular on Broadway. At its climax, a passionate lover has stolen gems intrusted to a young husband and wants to sell them to his wife for her honor. It is her husband's honor or her own. She is a swords woman and is willing to fight the villain for the gems. Here follows a spirited and very thrilling fencing match in which she wins, saving the honor both of herself and of her husband. The picture's great weakness is that it shows us too clearly just how the young husband lost the gems intrusted to him. It makes a contemptible idiot of him. It could easily have been shown differently or it needn't have been made so plain. The situation is fair and it is handled, except for this one bad break, very skilfully. Miss Ormi Hawley is the young wife and swords woman; Mr. Jack Halliday is her husband. Miss Hawley's black satin costume makes a fine photograph and all the scenes are well made and taken. It makes a good, interesting release.

"FROM THE LAWYER'S WINDOW" (Pathe), May 18.—A strong, dramatic and well handled picture. Six players have prominent roles and all do very creditable work. It tells first the love story of the lawyer and the pleasing daughter of the village drunkard; then how the drunkard, stupid with drink and asleep at the inn, is made to seem guilty of a murder, committed there by the bar-keeper. We don't see more of this than the lawyer saw from his window; but we see the plot of the bar-keeper and his friends and we fear for the innocent drunkard. The picture also tells how this narrow escape of the drunkard from being hanged makes him break from the drink habit. The picture also shows how the evil men were brought to justice. It is convincing, absorbingly interesting, and well photographed. Messrs. Johnson and Arling play the leads.

"A ROMANCE OF THE ICE FIELDS" (Edison), May 18.—A picture that seems to have reached far for a terribly thrilling climax, so far indeed that the effect is almost as though it had failed to get it. The hero actor had to jump into icy waters of a swift-flowing river that is carrying thick ice and to do this at the very lip of what seemes to be a dangerous fall. There was a rope strung across; but he ran some danger of missing this. As far as we can discover there is no great demand for such risks. In this case, the attention is taken away from the story, as a story, and given wholly to the actor's real action at the making of the picture. The highest art would not permit our minds to lose the story thus; it would shun doing so. This was the more marked because the incident that set the hero on a cake of ice was not at all convincing. If a thrill alone is wanted, this climax gives it. The story is not fresh or strong. As a picture of the ice harvesting, it is very good; for the photographs are excellent.

"THE MAN UNDER THE BED" (Vitagraph), May 18.—A pleasing and amusing burglar-comedy in which three children, left alone in the house, are the centers of interest. It is their interpretation of the situation that awakens the sympathy and make the fun. These children are played by Miss Zena Kiefe, Miss Adele de Garde and Master Kenneth Casey. They do very well. It is slight; but is full of human nature and is very well pictured.

"A MEXICAN ROMANCE" (Lubin), May 15.—People seem to like these romances in Mexican costume and with sun-lit backgrounds, cactus, grapevine-shaded drinking places and the porches and patios of Mexican homes. They do not need to be convincing stories; most of them are not. This is not. It has well-photographed, graceful girls in pretty dresses and it has proud, romantic looking lovers. The chief business of all these is making love. They do very well; are very satisfactory. The scenes in which the love making is set are often very pretty. The camera work is excellent.

"THE PILGRIMAGE" (Kalem), May 17.—It is not often that a picture, illustrating a great poet's idea, is so successful as this is in interpreting in pictures Heine's poem, "The Pilgrimage." The leaders use a translation that has clearness and accuracy; but the pictures are far more successful; they seem to have got the very spirit of the poem. The scenario writer deserves praise for the scene arrangement and the producer deserves praise for the handling of the scenes; they are full of grace. The posed statue of the Madonna in it is simple and beautiful. Gretchen, William's sweetheart, will most surely get a strong hold of the spectators' sympathies. Her acting is lovely, and she, herself, fills the part perfectly. The lover acts in a worthy, manly way. The object of the picture is to excite sympathy, then pity and then to console it. The camera work is beautiful. It is an unusually commendable picture.

"JUSTICE OF MANITU" (Pathe), May 16.—A picture of Indians and white people in the West of today. The picture does not really record the justice of Manitu, not directly; it was the friends of the murdered Indian who killed his white murderer. As far as the picture shows, we are not sure it was justice at all. The story of the insulted squaw, the chase of the three cowboys by the enraged brave, the demand for a fair fight which resulted in the Indian's death and the severe wounding of his white antagonist, together with all that came of it, make an interesting, but not a deeply emotional picture. The scenes and backgrounds are very praiseworthy. The camera work is commendable.

"THE CONVICT'S PAROLE" (Edison), May 17.—A melodrama in which a kindly and progressive governor figures as the "god from the machine" to show up the evil deeds of grafting, villainous politicians and to make a good heroine and hero triumphant. It tells a good story, not realistic, but full of humanity and very pleasing. It has some freshness, although it makes use of all a melodrama's privileges. It will surely please the great body of spectators. The players are of the best; Miss Mary Fuller takes the leading role. The photography is very good.

"AFTER THE REWARD" (Essanay), May 17.—A fair farce comedy situation is well handled in this picture which a large audience seemed to find very amusing. The reward was $50, offered for the arrest of a mysterious couple who were entering houses, temporarily vacant, to rob. A young married couple leave their apartment to pay a visit to their parents in the country. The old folks, that same morning, come to the city to visit them. Also the young wife has asked a friend to look after and feed her dog, and, without knowing this, the young husband has asked a friend of his to do the same. Together, they all manage to get the situation into a skilfully made tangle. The camera work is very fair.

"BRAINS AND BRAWN" (Selig), May 17.—A satisfactory, comic picture of a backwoods school and a backwoods school committee. The committee sent to "Bedin" College for a foot ball graduate as the only kind of teacher who would do. He came. He fought the whole school and won out. The same sets, as in "The New Woman and the Lion," of recent date, are used for the Vermont village. The photography is good and the spectators enjoyed the picture.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS' NO. 3" (Selig), May 17.—On the same reel is this third installment which afforded a good many laughs. In quality, it is the same as the preceding numbers in this series.

"THE ROYAL WHIM" (C. G. P. C.), May 17.—A colored film with some extremely beautiful scenes. It seems to have been played in and around some fine, old country mansion in France, and much skill is shown, not only in the development of the situation, but in the choice of scenes. The closing scene, in which the sovereign, who is paying a visit to a nobleman, his vassal, takes leave, is very artistic and very beautiful. The acting seems a bit stilted, but since the story is rather unnatural, this is not a grave fault. The picture stands on its grace, rather than on its dramatic quality and the audience seemed to enjoy it. The camera work and the coloring are both of a high order.

"WHEN KINGS WERE THE LAW" (Biograph), May 20.—A picture in the costumes of the period of Louis XIII, when Richelieu was a power in France. The king of this picture is not Louis, but has a very dim likeness to him; the picture's cardinal is even less like the great Richelieu, yet the picture, throughout, strongly suggests that time and court. It has a very strong last scene, in which the king has his "favorite" and his cousin entombed alive together, because he suspects them, unjustly. But the early scenes, while clearly dramatic, are much weaker. The scenes and backgrounds pass very well for Versailles and its courts and fountains. The acting is graceful and competent. There are many figures. These, with its thrilling, but happily ending climax, make it a desirable picture. The photographs are very good indeed.

"EGYPT, AS IT WAS IN THE TIME OF MOSES" (Kalem), May 20.—An educational picture of much importance. The camera has given photographs that are very praiseworthy, considering the conditions. For further comments and lecture on this picture, see Moving Picture World for April 27, page 311. This short and very excellent lecture will add greatly to the value of this release. We believe that the picture, if pushed judiciously, can be made a powerfully telling argument for any moving picture house that wants high class patronage.

"A CITIZEN IN THE MAKING" (Selig), May 20.—A very good picture indeed, telling us how immigrants reach our shores and something of what becomes of them when once admitted. The hero and heroine are Jewish people, and they get separated. Through the work of the Jewish Immigrant Society, they are at length happily reunited. The scenes were taken partly in New York, on board ship, at Ellis Island, and at the dock of the Barge Office, and partly in Chicago. There are also a couple of farm scenes. The story is slight, just enough to make the picture human; but it is very natural, convincing and pleasing. The acting is fine. The photography is very good.

"PROFESSOR OPTIMO" (Vitagraph), May 20.—A pleasing and human smile-picture or heart-comedy. Mr. Marshall P. Wilder is Prof. Optimo, and we think the part fits him better than any he has ever played. He, as a crystal gazing clairvoyant who charges nothing, but makes every one, high and low, wait their turns, tells each, in substance, that if he or she will keep smiling, he or she will win. It is just a picture of human good feeling and of smiles; but there's a slight but pleasing and happy love story too. The spectators began by smiling in sympathy. But a smile is like a seed, it grows. It was not long before we were all breaking forth in rippling merriment, like little waves on a sunny lake. It is a good, healthy picture. We commend it. The photography is fine.

"RIVALS" (Selig), May 21.—A picture photographed on Santa Catalina Island and giving some very good views of it. It is a slight, but clearly told story of love and jealously that repented of its almost murderous passion. The girl sends both young men up "Black Top" with the promise that the one who shot "Old Billy" and brought his head to her she will marry. "Old Billy" seems to have been a wild goat; for one lover shoots into the distance and then brings out a goat's head. It was a mounted head and the audience laughed. The other lover sees it and grows so furiously jealous that he trys to steal the head. There's a struggle and the first man goes headlong down a steep slope. We don't believe that Mr. Hobart Bosworth enjoyed that particular part of his role. The camera work is good.

"HOLLOWHEAD AS A MAGICIAN" (C. G. P. C.), May 21.—A farce something on the order of the old Foolshead farces, but funnier. It made many laughs. There is some excellent trick photography in it.

"THE CULTURE OF MANIOC AND THE MAKING OF TAPIOCA" (C. G. P. C.), May 21.—A very well photographed and colored industrial picture of an important industry of the Philippine Islands. The value of such films to the world is immense. This picture is very commendable in its complete showing of tapioca from the roots to the pudding.

"FATIMA" (Cines), May 21.—A picture of African-Arabian life. It tells a good love story that is effective and not tragic. The sets and backgrounds are very interesting, the players pleasing and the acting very good. The photography is very clear.

"SCENES IN PADUA, ITALY" (Cines), May 21.—On the same reel is this picture of one of Italy's often-mentioned cities. The camera work is very fair. It is short.

"A WESTERN LEGACY" (Essanay), May 21.—All the freshness in this picture, it has much and made many laughs, comes from the players and the acting. The situation is not fresh, and, at its best, only serves to afford a vehicle for acting. The uncle's will demands that the hero and heroine wed to get a million. Each makes up to be distasteful to the other and the girl wins, but cupid wills that the two should fall in love anyway. Mr. Anderson makes up in a yellow wig and mustache. It makes him almost handsome and that is "going some" surely. The girl and her family made good laughs also, but Alkali Ike is the best thing in the picture. It is pretty good entertainment and the photography is fair.

"THEIR HERO" (Edison), May 21.—Another "Siwash College" story by Geo. Fitch. The situation is as fresh as good air and full of comedy. The great foot ball hero is worshiped by two sophomores. Time passes. All these are graduated. The hero, a lawyer without clients, has gone broke and is hungry. One of the most commendable things about this picture is that the heroworship withstands all the shocks of seeing the man down and ready to work manfully as a porter. The audience plainly showed that it enjoyed the picture; it is worthy. Mr. Geo. Lessey plays the "hero," Messrs. O'More and Beaumont play the two sophomores. We also see Mr. McDermott, Miss Elizabeth Miller, Miss Natalie Kindgen and Mr. John Sturgeon.

Independent.

"THE RING OF A SPANISH GRANDEE" (Thanhouser), May 24.—Many of the scenes of this picture were taken in the old fortress at St. Augustine, in Florida. The girl (Miss Snow) is shown an old Spanish ring and is told the story of it. That afternoon, near the fountain at the hotel, she falls asleep and dreams what most likely was the truth of this story. The lover who told the story had boasted of his ancestors; she finds him in her dream of years ago as the fortress's cook. Her other lover is the real brave soldier. A romantic love story follows. It it played in costume in the old stone fort where it is very well set and effective. It is acted with the usual Thanhouser grace. Miss Marguerite Snow, Miss Florence LaBadie, Mr. Cruze, Mr. Russel and others, whose names we do not know, appear. Many of the scenes are very pretty pictures. It is also pleasantly amusing. The camera work is very good.

"A CAVE MAN WOOING" (Imp), May 20.—A story of the effect of elemental ideas, such as are set forth in dime novels, on a man of not very strong individuality. King Bagott plays this man. At first he tries to act a sissy boy, a thing he, with his facial expression and bearing, finds quite impossible to make real. However, his very lack of success adds to the fun and this is a farce comedy. He is shown as taking exercise and hardening up to the point of being like a bag of nails, and all for the sake of the girl; but no one will blame him for his taste. He runs off with her to the parson's, like a cave man. This makes many real laughs. It is all right. The camera work is good.

"THE CLOWN'S TRIUMPH" (Imp), May 23.—Circus life furnishes the scenes and backgrounds for most of this picture. The circus's Punchinello has a serious falling out with Mimi (Miss Vivian Prescott), the circus's Columbine. They separate and meet again under dramatic circumstances in the midst of an act in a London theatre. It is a big picture full of human beauty and dignity with the most dramatic contrasts, such as the clown's presence in his queer costume in what he fears is the death chamber of the woman he loves. The acting is fine, the story is straightforward and effective, the photograph is beautiful. A very commendable picture.

"THE WANDERING GYPSY" (American), May 23.—There is an old folk lore story in which we always find the brave adventurer, or the princess in distress, helping some old hag who is in difficulty, only to find in her a goddess or a fairy who can return the favor. Miss Von Trump, in this picture, plays a girl who is distressed by a bully, Mr. Richardson. She helps a wandering gypsy. A lone prospector (Mr. Kerrigan) also helps the gypsy. This gypsy in return brings the hero to discomfort the villain and starts a love story. It is a slight, romantic picture with a dramatic ending, and is well acted and well photographed. It has a pleasing quality.

"THE GLORY OF LIGHT" (Solax), May 22.—It tells the story of a man who was blinded and became a beggar. Everyone, nearly, is kind to him and he dreams a dream of what might have been his life had he not been blinded. It gives a series of scenes of difficulty, disappointment and penury for wife and child, without hope. These scenes are interesting; but they are not wholly truthful and leave a pessimistic feeling which the picture's happy ending does not wholly make up for. The acting and photography are good.

"MRS. ALDEN'S AWAKENING" (Champion), May 22.—Mrs. Alden is a woman's club woman who neglects her little girl. It tells how the child's governess worked on the fears of the mother, who is made to think that the child is injured. The story, although the scenario certainly lacks strength or grip on truly human conditions, is pretty well conducted. Mrs. Alden, a good player, looks much too young for her part. The child's role is made very pleasing indeed. Miss Evelyn Francis plays with her usual grace the part of governess and sweetheart of Mrs. Alden's son, played by Mr. Cummings. The camera work is very serviceable.

"FOR THE GOOD OF ALL" (Powers), May 21.—A well conducted, romantic comedy with pretty, homely farm scenes at Grandma's in the country. The quality of the scenes, light-hearted, full of poetry and truthful, can hardly be too highly praised. The heroine (Miss Fritzi) has been sent to Grandma's, because she has threatened to elope. That was the natural thing to do, the best place to send her. It is in apple blossom time. She has fun with some humanly and convincingly foolish country boys, till her own true love comes to get her. Grandma gives him a surprise. It's a good, wholesome picture, pretty well photographed. It will please many.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE WEST" (Republic), May 21.—"The Old Chief's Dream" is the subtitle of this picture. It is told as a dream of an old chief who, in Washington, sits down to rest on the steps of the Capitol and falls asleep. A sweep of broad prairie takes the place of the city streets and a story of settlement days and Indian attack is on the screen. The red men attack a little wooden cabin where four white women and two children defend themselves, and cowboys ride hard to the rescue. It is managed with fair skill for the sake of thrills, but is pictured wholly from the white man's viewpoint and as such is not convincing. The camera work is only fair on this print at least.

"CHAMBER OF FORGETFULNESS" (Eclair), May 21.—Mr. Francis plays in this picture the role of a very jealous husband. A player who seems to be new in Eclair pictures (Barbara Tennant) fills the role opposite to him in the early scenes, and is not only very personable herself, but a good player. The picture is well acted by every member of the cast and well conducted. The sets and scenes are good, some of them beautiful. The husband's insane jealousy really caused the wife's death. After this he wouldn't have their child near him. His wife's room remained untouched; it was the chamber of forgetfulness. One day he saw her ghost (extremely well done) in this room. It made him read her papers and then (it was years later) he discovered what a fool he had been. Her happy ghost now appears to him. It is a very interesting picture.

"THE THREAD OF LIFE" (American), May 20.—Miss Pauline Bush plays, in this interesting and very well photographed picture, the role of an invalid who is wheeled about in her chair. A starving fugitive outlaw (Mr. Kerrigan), chased by the sheriff (Richardson) and posse, passes near where she is resting. His plight stirs her pity, and her kindness and sympathy stirs his manhood. A dramatic love story, in which the doctor aids, and the girl's death and the outlaw's death follow. It was hard to play such a role as Miss Bush fills in this picture without sentimentality; but she handles the situation with much skill. The result is a very vivid and powerful picture.

"FATHER BEAUCLAIRE" (Reliance), May 25.—A picture reported to be historically true and to have been related by Cardinal Gibbons. It is an adventure of a priest, Father Beauclaire, played by Hal Reid, and set in some southern land, perhaps France. He is sentenced to death for a murder and keeps silent, although the culprit had confessed to him. By his superiors in the church he is, the leader says, excommunicated, and dies rather than reveal the secret of the confessional. Later, retribution comes to the scoundrel. The workmanship shown by this picture throughout is of high grade and is very impressive. The photography is very good.

"THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S CONSCIENCE" (Reliance), May 23. A good picture, so well conducted in every way and so naturally photographed that it seems more interesting as a picture of real happenings, as though the illustrations of a newspaper had come to life, than as a work of art. Yet it doesn't fall down on dramatic quality; on the other hand, it is tensely dramatic. The few departures from the line of truth that a close inspection might reveal are leaped, so to speak by the inertia of the action. The struggle comes out of the district attorney's peculiar position. His reputation demands that he obtain convictions on evidence. Sometimes, as in this case, he feared this evidence was not conclusive, but it turns out so in the end. Mr. Henry Walthall, very well supported, plays the picture. The photographs are good.

"THE BEAUTY SPOT" (Eclair), May 23.—A pretty, romantic comedy that might have been called "Archie's Job," which was promoting the fashion of wearing beauty spots, little squares of court plaster. He had plenty of money; but his sweetheart's father demanded that he get a job. Being very unsuccessful, his bright brain conceived the great idea. At one afternoon reception, Archie's good work gets him into trouble. Explanations that he makes are not acceptable, but in the end he comes out all right. It is very light; but is also light-hearted. There are pretty girls aplenty and pretty scenes. It is a picture to lighten a heavy program.

"TOMMY BECOMES A TOREADOR" (Gaumont), May 23.—A rich uncle leaves a fortune to his niece on the condition that she marry a toreador. Tommy, a butcher's helper, reads of this in the newspapers and sees a chance that his romantic soul eagerly takes up. He becomes a toreador and opens at a try-out afternoon in the arena. He is up against a real and very ugly bull, but with padded horns. Tommy is a first-rate comedian. If this farce doesn't make any given audience roar with laughter, there surely must be something the matter with it. The real toreador comes on and wins the heiress. Tommy, back at his old job, is delivering meat and sees the happiness of the lovers. It is a very funny rough-business farce, well photographed.

"MARRIED WITHOUT KNOWING IT" (Eclair), May 19.—Another artistic picture by the French company, with backgrounds taken from peasant life. It is a comedy and, as such, not an accurate portrayal of life; but it has a fresh and strong situation and most of its humor comes from the producer's knowledge of human peculiarities and from his insight. It is slight and short; but bright and amusing. The camera work is very good. The two on this reel make a desirable release.

"TYPES OF THE CAUCASUS" (Eclair), May 19.—On the same reel is this very commendable painted picture, giving excellent studies of the strange and markedly contrasted types of people living in the mountains between Russia and Persia. Some of these people are Russian, some are Persian, some seem to be mixed. There is much beauty in the picture, and it is very well photographed. Truly a fine offering.

"THE CASHIER'S ORDEAL" (Champion), May 20.—The cashier was innocent. The bank examiners are expected to audit the books in a day. He finds out that $50,000 had been taken from the vaults, under circumstances that would fasten the blame on him. His ordeal comes the night before the bank is to be examined. He is kept from killing himself, however, by an enemy who knows the circumstances. In the morning he is cleared. It is a very good picture, realistically conducted and acted. The story is fresh, smoothly developed and has much vitality. The photographs are fine, the backgrounds and sets good.

"LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET" (Imp), May 16.—The Moving Picture World has already commended this big two-reel picture, taken from the novel, very popular a few years ago. No further comment is needed. But we may add that we enjoyed watching it very much. The sets, photography and acting seem especially fine. Miss Jane Fernley and King Bagott play the leads. The second reel is very dramatic. It makes a fine picture, a true thriller.

"HIS NEIGHBOR'S WIFE" (Powers), May 17.—If it had been at all possible to make the action called for by this scenario convincing, one feels that the producers and the players who made it would have accomplished this. The relationship of the scenes, the quality of the acting, and the sets and backgrounds all show much artistic ability. Just as it is, the picture might convince some, although much of the business is almost impossible. It is a picture that will interest and please. The players are acceptable (the heroine is Miss Fritzi) and keep the pictures full of light comedy spirit. The camera work is excellent and many of the scenes beautiful.

"THE POWER OF MELODY" (Nestor), May 20.—A picture that, in the impression that it leaves, is off the well-traveled road and fresh. This is partly because it is so well acted and conducted that it convinces. The melody that the publisher wouldn't listen to and refused was played by its composer in a flashy restaurant. The publisher's daughter, who was leading a fast life and breaking her parents' hearts, heard it there and it made her realize her spiritual condition so keenly that she returned home. It is well acted; but the role of the girl's mother seems especially well filled. However, the composer's home life scenes are also very good indeed. It is a picture with a wide scope and has many important roles; yet it is clear and effective throughout.

"HENPECKED IKE" (Imp), May 18.—This picture farce comedy has three chief players, Ike (Ed. Lyons), his wife, who keeps a Western boarding house (Louise Crolius), and the family burro, a gentle little donkey. Ike runs away with the burro, through very pretty Western mountain scenes, and has very laughable adventures. The way grows long and wearisome. The burro will carry the load, but refuses to carry Ike. It is an enjoyable and very pleasing picture, light, clean and wholesome. The camera work is very good.

"AN ENGLISH STAG HUNT" (Imp), May 18.—On the same reel we find this thrilling view of an English hunt with dogs. Many wide views of typical English country are included, forest, downs and farms. The herd is large and is followed by many horsemen and women. The views are very fortunate. The camera has caught one stag as he turns at bay and then takes to the water. Walter Scott's poems "have very little" on such pictures as this. The camera work is good. These two pictures could be shown anywhere to sensible people. The whole release would furnish them with very acceptable entertainment and good instruction.

"IN THE YEAR 2000" (Solax), May 17.—A burlesque in the costumes of almost a hundred years from now. The women have taken the place of men in society. A very melodramatic story is enacted with heroine and villainess and the poor hero locked up in his room, because he wants to marry the heroine. Desperate Dorothy has her gang of women thugs to help her, and poor Claudine, the heroine, is left tied to a post while a candle burns down into a barrel of sugar—we mean powder. The players have given it the right atmosphere and it is amusing. There are many good laughs in it. It will be popular. The camera work is very good. It certainly is not a serious picture of the year 2000; the producer took no care to make it seem so. He was content to make it an easy-to-produce burlesque.

"TRIFLE NOT WITH FIRE" (Republic), May 18.—A picture whose early scenes were taken about the very beautiful buildings of the College of the City of New York and whose later scenes are supposed to be in the West. It is a problem picture of love between a white girl and an Indian. Racial differences kept them apart for a time. The girl refused him in the East, where he was a student at college. Later, a married woman, the Indian in the West saves her from a runaway horse and the old flame awakes in both. She decides to leave her husband and run off with the red man, but a little glimpse of realistic Indian life opens her eyes. It is a well acted, clearly photographed, effective picture. The ending is tragic and leaves some doubt which way the girl would finally choose. A bank of sandy rocks caves in under them as she and the red man are arguing and both are killed. We think that a girl of this character would have gone to the red man.

"HOW THE RANGER WAS CURED" (Nestor), May 22.—A good picture; it shows up a kind of foolishness that makes a man a patent medicine crank. The story, as in many other recent Nestors, is told as a dream, which is inserted between scenes of supposititiously actual happenings. It is convincingly conducted, if ever a dream was, and by making use of trick photography, it is put over in good, old-fashioned nightmare spirit. It is a picture that will interest and thrill. The camera work is very good.

ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 10 (M. P. Dist. and Sales Co.), May 14.—This week's topical is of remarkable interest. The world has been startled recently by accounts of the gangs of desperate outlaws who have been operating near Paris. One of the items in this number shows the dynamiting of a garage in which part of this band had turned at bay. The authorities make two attempts to blow it up. At the second trial, it is literally smashed over the bandits' heads. There is also a series of excellent views of the inauguration ceremonies at Princeton, when its new president, Dr. Hibben, was installed. These include one of the best pictures of President Taft that we have seen, also the procession of faculty and students, and the open-air exercises held at the back of Nassau Hall. An item that will widely interest gives pictures of fine dogs, seen at the annual bench show, Washington, D. C. A picture of the Titanic at her dock and of the Mackay-Bennett bringing in the bodies are shown, as is a view of the Paris horse show at St. Cloud. A picture of a steeplechase and one of the fashionable crowd make up this item. Other items are a review of English soldiers (short); of the boy scouts of New Jersey, who were presented with banners and then paraded; of the motor car that recently made a cross-continent trip; of the fall of two big chimneys in Berlin (these were dynamited down); of the motion picture men of Kentucky, who recently met in Lexington, and last, but not least, a very good view of Father Vaughan of England, who is visiting America.

THE STARLAND PALACE.

It is reported that the Starland Limited, a corporation controlling a chain of theaters throughout the United States and Canada, is having plans drawn for an expensive moving picture theater to be built at 1514-16-18 Douglas Street, Omaha, Neb., seating probably 1,650, depending entirely upon whether one or two balconies are to be built. The theater will be named the "Starland Palace." The structure will be three or four stories in height and will be 66 feet wide by 132 feet deep. With terra cotta front in polychrome scheme, suspended bronze marquise and green tile roof, it will be a handsome building. The interior will also be most attractive and elaborate with lobby, foyer and other features of large theaters. A beautiful soda fountain will stand in the lobby and there will be, opening off the lobby, a nursery, a ladies' retiring room and a men's smoking room. Excavation for the building has already begun, and the opening is expected about the first of September.

INQUIRIES

N. J.—Miss Anita Gantmanoff was the squaw in Bison's "Wenona's Broken Promise." The delay in replying is due to the necessity for sending to Los Angeles for the information.

MISS LAWRENCE—Through a misunderstanding of the facts this department announced a couple of weeks ago that Miss Florence Lawrence would become a Powers player. The facts were correctly stated elsewhere in the same issue, but for purpose of record it is stated here that Miss Lawrence will be at the head of her own company on the Independent side, and not with the Powers players.

MRS. C. A. D.—It was Francis Ford who was the Coward in Bison's "War on the Plains." He is cast as "The Rival."

W. F.—Almost any office building contains at least one public stenographer who will be glad to type scenarios at ten or fifteen cents a page. If you find someone who wants more try the next. It should be easy in New York.

J. A. M.—Read the advertisements for the Thanhouser special for June. The company has not yet announced it. William Meyers was the other telegrapher in Bison's "The Post Telegrapher." The three criminals in Solax's "Saved by a Cat" were Lee Beggs, Pat Foy and John Leaverton. John Halliday was Douglas and Charles Arthur Briston in Lubin's "The Cure of John Briston." Don't you think that eleven questions is rather stretching things? That's why all are not answered.

M. G.—There is no set rule as to whether scripts go to the home office or the field studio. Send for a list that gives the correct address in the case of all established companies, or make up your list from the data now running in The Photoplay department.

S. J.—The Western Essanay seems to have settled at Niles for the Summer. The Bison releases are made in the vicinity of Los Angeles.

C. F. K.—The Pathe Freres are almost in the same class with Biograph as regards names. They do not reply to questions. Miss Ruth Boland was Nell in Kalem's "Hypnotic Nell."

H. K.—The Powers Company made several releases in which Miss Gladys Fields appeared, but does not classify the list. Look for releases with titles indicating that the pictures were made in the Southwest. We do not believe that Owen Moore appeared in small parts with recent Edisons. He is not cast in the play named. We'll have to pass the next two questions, but getting to the "important" question, we do not think that Guy Coombs was angry because you asked about his eyes. If he was, the fact you think him handsome should atone. We do not classify photoplayers' habits, so can't tell you what his are.

M. H.—Roswell Johnson still appears in Lubin pictures when there is a part for him.

E. deB. Y.—Your question raises a question of ethics. You state that a certain company paid you for a script which they now return, after the lapse of a year, with the statement that it is unavailable. You add that the story was returned by an editor other than the one who made the purchase. We do not think that you have the right to send the story out again to some other company. The first company paid you for it and it became their property. The new editor probably did not know that it was paid for and sent it back on that account. Records are loosely kept in most studios. We think it would be no more than honest to write the company, explaining that it was sent you possibly through mistake and offering to return it to them unless their return was intentional. If they give you permission then you are free to offer it again, but until you get a formal release the story is the property of the company first making the purchase. On the other hand, the company, having made the purchase, cannot turn the script back to you with a demand for the purchase price, as you seem to fear. Be square about it. It will pay in the long run, even if you do think you can sell the same story to another company now that it is back.

PIPPA PASSES—We have been swamped with letters declaring that it was Miss Gertrude Robinson, and not Miss Lawrence, who played the title in Biograph's "Pippa Passes." Miss Robinson, being questioned, replies that it was she who played the part. This seems to settle it.

HILL CITY—When you want to ask a question, make up your mind whether you want to address this paper or the Motion Picture Story Magazine. The "stage name" of Mrs. Costello is "Mrs. Costello." Adele de Garde is not one of the Costello children. The most likely market for a photoplay depends wholly on the photoplay.

MISS C. R.—Owen Moore is unplaced at present, but we should not be surprised to learn of his connection very shortly.

V. S. M.—Miss Ruth Roland was the schoolma'm in Kalem's "The Schoolma'm of Stone Gulch." The Biograph player must remain unidentified.

E. W. S.—"Bust" in photoplay writing is the technical term for a picture made so close to the subject that the figures are enlarged. It is not used in the photographic sense of a bust portrait, but may mean anything taken close to, perhaps a locket, a poker hand, or anything that must be clearly shown.

READER—The National Board of Censorship passes on all film submitted to it, sitting part of the time in the offices of the Motion Pictures Patents Company, and part of the time in the Sales Co. offices. Their conclusions are accepted by most cities, but there are a number of local censorships police or otherwise, which pass on film for certain localities within police jurisdiction. Generally speaking, the National Censorship extends everywhere, but these exceptions should be noted.

MISS C.—Send a stamped and addressed envelope to the Lubin Company for a sample scenario, and one to this paper for a list of addresses of photoplay editors, but when you write the editors don't use a postal card to tell them you are a society woman. They won't believe it.

L. Y.—We cannot quite "get" your question, but it was William Russell, who was the Commandant in Thanhouser's "A Love of Long Ago," if that is what you mean.

E. R. C.—When a photoplay is released it is released all over the country on the same day. Certain theaters take it the first day, others the second, and so to about the end of the first month, after which it becomes a "commercial," and is no longer a "dated run." It may be seen after that for from six months to a year or more. Copyright does not apply to titles, but to the matter of the text. It is not a good plan, however, to use well known titles for your original plots. If you can think up a plot you should be able to think up a title. You can use stories on which the copyright has expired, but it is doubtful if you can sell them. Selling is the important part and the original plot is the salable one.

G. C.—We do not find Mr. Neil in recent Edison casts. The Edison Kinetogram gives "Officer of the Child Labor Organization, William West." You may know you are right, but we are inclined to believe the company correct. Why should they use several casts in making a photoplay when one negative will suffice?

TRIPP—"Priscilla's Capture" was released February 29th of this year. You will find your other questions answered in recent issues.

J. W.—Send stamped and addressed envelope for addresses you desire.

B. J. W.—We do not know the highest price ever paid a player. The leads in Edison's "Rowdy and His New Pal" were George Lessey and Miss Bliss Milford. Yale Boss was their son, and Philip Tannura the other boy. You'll have to ask something easier than the name of the theater showing the largest number of Licensed reels. From three to six is the average.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"REPARATION" (Republic).

A rather touching little comedy has been produced by the Republic Film Company for release on June 4th under the title of "Reparation." The story has been often told in different forms, but loses none of its charm in the retelling. A college boy named Bert Morton for the purpose of this story is on an automobile tour with some of his companions. Stopping at a farmhouse for refreshments, Bert meets a very pretty daughter of a farmer, with whom he falls deeply in love. The feeling is mutual and the two young folks become very much infatuated with each other.

Bert's father has other plans for his future and summons him home to marry a girl who has been picked out for his wife. Advising the young man that the marriage will result to the financial advantage of the family, the father persuades the boy to follow his advice and, although Bert deeply loves his country sweetheart, he takes his father's advice and tries to forget the little girl in the country. When the country girl does not hear from her lover she decides to visit him. They meet and Bert tells her that he cannot marry her and that she must forget him. He offers her money, which she refuses and, utterly heartbroken, she attempts suicide. From this course she is prevented, and the two workmen who saved her from throwing herself over a cliff take her to what proves to be the home of Bert's fiancée. Little by little the girl to whom Bert is engaged learns the unpleasant truth of the relationship between her intended husband and the little country girl, and eventually persuades the young man that he must keep his promise. She absolves him from any duty to her, and Bert confesses and receives his father's forgiveness along with a hearty welcome for his bride, the little country girl he met at the farmhouse. The story is very carefully told in the picture and contains some interesting views.

RADIUM GOLD FIBER SCREEN FOR KINEMACOLOR.

Mr. E. H. Spitzer, New York representative of the American Theater Curtain Company, of St. Louis, reports a number of good sales this week. But he is particularly jubilant over the receipt of an order from the Kinemacolor Company of America for a Radium Gold Fiber Screen. Mr. Spitzer has made a number of other excellent sales.

NEW INDUSTRIAL FILM COMPANY.

The American Industrial Film Company is a new organization recently formed to manufacture industrial pictures. W. L. Brind, formerly with Carl Laemmle and the World's Best Film Company, and Gustave Nettle are the promoters. The company has offices at 1019 Flatiron Building, Twenty-third Street, New York City.

"MAKING GOOD" (Melies).

Scheduled for early release by the Melies Company is a picture entitled "Making Good," that is somewhat above the average reached by that company's product. Excellent photography puts this film in the A-1 class from the start. A fairly interesting story adds several points of excellence, and a careful portrayal increases the sum total. Further interest is gained by the fact that this picture was taken in the California oilfields and shows some of the methods of getting the oil out of the ground. If the story lacked interest, these scenes alone would carry the picture through; but there is a good story and it is told in an interesting manner.

Tom is a wayward son who has been thrown out of his home by an irate father for dissolute habits. The father admonishes him never to come back until he can make good. Determining to brace up and be a man, the young fellow decides to go West. He is without money and is unable to raise any, except by pawning his dead mother's ring. This he refuses to do. So he jumps a freight train and makes his way Westward as best he can. When he has almost reached his destination he is suddenly thrown from the train and later is discovered lying beside the track in an unconscious condition by the daughter of the foreman in charge of the oil farm. The girl manages to drag the unconscious man to her home, where he is taken care of.

Scene from "Making Good" (Melies).

When Tom gets strong enough to work the foreman gives him a job, but when Tom falls in love with the foreman's daughter there is trouble between him and the father. A fight follows and Tom falls unconscious upon a moving belt. Just as he is about to be drawn under the wheel, the girl, seeing him, rushes to the rescue and saves his life. The situation causes the father to relent and he later consents to the marriage between Tom and his daughter.

A year later when Tom and his wife have become nicely established, the boy writes home to tell his father that he is making good. Just as the letter is about to be enclosed his wife naively exhibits a few "small clothes" to her husband, and with a laugh the happy Tom adds a few significant lines to the letter. It is a very creditable production and should be favorably received wherever shown.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

The Vitagraph Company of America hereby takes occasion to notify those concerned that Mr. Charles L. Fuller, at one time employed by this company, had no authority whatever to secure money in our name. He is not now in any way connected with this company, and has not been since the 25th of January, 1912.

"THE FOREIGN SPY" (Nestor).

A very interesting story, with a tense dramatic situation, is "The Foreign Spy," produced by the Nestor Co. and to be released on May 27th, 1912. It is a story that grips one and keeps one breathless from the beginning of the spy's wiles to the time when she realizes the futility of her designs. Josephine Ricketts plays this character, which calls for highly emotional acting, and she very successfully depicts the unscrupulous woman "Celeste," who gains her ends by beguiling men with her charms until, in their mad infatuation, she manages to obtain valuable information for the country by whom she is employed. The inevitable result is ruin for her victims until one Captain Carter (portrayed by Sydney Ayres) determines to avenge himself for the years he has spent in prison and the loss of his good name. So, after many years of waiting, he sees his chance and confronts the woman with her treachery, which ends in the self-destruction of the spy "Celeste."

A most beautiful setting for this splendid drama is the room in which the spy receives her unsuspecting victim, a young officer, Lieutenant Howe (cleverly acted by Donald MacDonald). Intoxicated with the beauty of the woman, the young lieutenant confides in her that he has the plans of the coast defence on his person, and it is then that "Celeste's" artifices are brought into play. Although the young officer's senses have become dull with the wine he has drunk, he has no intention of letting the plans out of his possession and when the woman realizes that her fascinations are useless, she determines to resort to a quicker method. Requesting the servant to bring coffee, "Celeste" guardedly pours a drug into the lieutenant's cup. Breathlessly one awaits the outcome of this move, when the tall form of Captain Carter appears and, just as the young officer is about to swallow the contents of the cup, the hand of the avenger reaches forth and prevents another man's undoing. The woman, seeing that escape is impossible, kills herself rather than suffer death at the hands of her former victim.

Scene from "The Foreign Spy" (Nestor).

This gripping story is accompanied with excellent photography, and the combination results in the picture being one of the finest dramas ever produced.

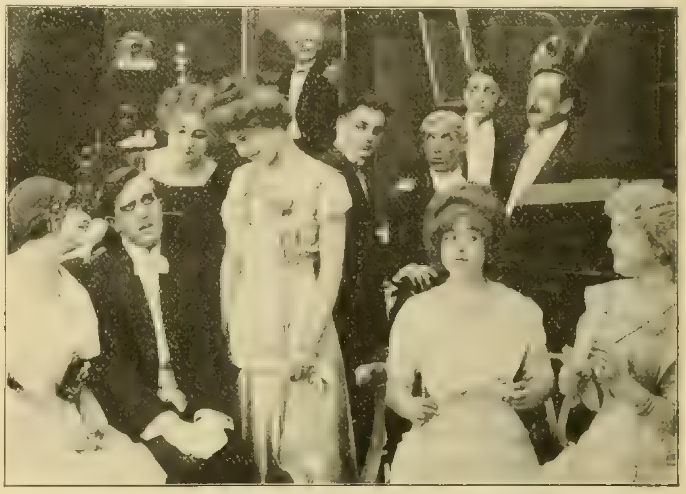
MR. ROBERT McWADE IN "RIP VAN WINKLE."

The Vitagraph Company of America have arranged with Robert McWade to play the leading character and to produce his version of "Rip Van Winkle." Mr. McWade is considered Joseph Jefferson's only rival in the portrayal of Washington Irving's famous character in history and literature, made still more famous on the stage by Joseph Jefferson and Robert McWade. The Vitagraph production in motion pictures of "Rip Van Winkle" and the appearance of Mr. McWade in the title role will give it still greater fame and bring it still more comprehensively before the peoples of the world.

"THE LEGACY OF HAPPINESS" (Essanay).

The gnawing discontentment caused by lack of wealth and the lust for same, and one way of curing this modern disease is strikingly shown in a powerful Essanay drama entitled "The Legacy of Happiness," released June 6th. The plot is novel and striking.

Allen Gordon, a young clerk, is dissatisfied and longs for great wealth. At his work he dreams of riches, and on awakening is grouchy because the visions were not real. That evening he calls on his sweetheart, to whom he is engaged, and is such a bore that she sends him home. An hour later he receives a letter from her saying his discontent would only make their married life miserable and breaks their engagement. Thoroughly disgusted he falls asleep beside the table and dreams an uncle in Italy dies and leaves him a fortune of one million dollars. With the help of his lawyer he now dons garments befitting his immense wealth and is introduced into society. Of course he falls into the clutches of a designing fortune-hunting young fop who schemes to marry him to his sister. Gordon meets her, is charmed with her attentions and asks her to become his wife. It is not until he hears the girl bragging of her conquest to the brother that he understands matters and determines to teach the schemers a lesson. He has his lawyer send him a fake telegram saying his fortune has been swept away, and is immediately turned down by his fiance and her family. Revealing the real truth, and laughing sarcastically at their discomfiture he departs—and awakens from the dream. Cured of all longing for wealth he hastens to his sweetheart, restores the ring to her finger and promises to cease grumbling for all time.



Scene from "The Legacy of Happiness" (Essanay).

The Essanay Company have made a very fine production of the theme. Dwight Mead, Lily Branscombe, Beverly Bayne and Howard Missimer play the principal roles with usual excellence, and the other members of the cast do admirable work. The various settings are richly mounted, especially the scenes at the society reception and the fashionable club where Gordon is first introduced to wealth.

The photography throughout is clear and clean-cut.

"THE SCALAWAG" (Nestor).

"The Scalawag," a stirring Western drama, produced by the Nestor Film Co., to be released on Wednesday, May 29th, is indeed a "Worth-While Film." The tense heart story, the exceptionally beautiful backgrounds and the excellent acting proclaim "The Scalawag" a photoplay of distinctive merit.

At first, one's sympathy goes out to the Scalawag's wife (Eugenia Forde), but after "The Scalawag" (Jack Conway), has asserted his manhood and proves himself to be made of good stuff after all, the wave of sympathy sweeps over to him and his unhappy ending leaves one really sorry. The story is pathetic and bristles with exciting action.

Another enjoyable and thrilling Nestor picture is "The Sheriff Outwitted," to be released Saturday, June 1st. Entrancing exterior scenes, a pleasant story, witching photography and unusual chases blend most harmoniously in this delightful Nestor production. "The Sheriff Outwitted" is the up-to-date old-fashioned Western thriller and will go big wherever shown.

"BILLY CHANGES HIS MIND" (Essanay).

This is one of the most refreshing, charming and joyous comedy gems the Essanay Company has released in months. It fairly bubbles with delicious situations, droll good humor and sparkling fun.

Billy McGrath, one bright morning, is fortunate in saving a most charming young woman from the attacks of a savage bulldog, extends his card and receives an invitation to call at her home the following evening. To make it sure, Ethel sends him her photo as a reminder. Next evening Billy dresses in haste and calls. Finding the outer door open, and rousing no one with his knocking, he enters and takes a seat in the library to await Ethel's appearance. Suddenly he is horrified to discover he has come off without his waistcoat. This will never do and he starts back to complete his toilet when the sound of footsteps drives him into a small adjoining room in a panic. Now the truth comes out, for Ethel and her parents enter and Billy is shocked to hear the old folks warn her to be sure and land him as she is nearly thirty and almost a has-been. So Billy keeps to his hiding-place in fear and trembling while Ethel patiently waits his coming. About ten she falls asleep, Billy roughly disguises himself as a burglar and tries to slip out but she detects him, her father enters and Billy has to fight himself out unrecognized. Next day Ethel receives word from Billy regretting his inability to call and saying he has been called to Darkest Africa and will probably never return.

Scene from "Billy Changes His Mind" (Essanay).

John Steppling raises an average of one good laugh to the foot in his popular role of "Billy," and Lily Branscombe is seen to splendid advantage as Ethel.

Photographically the production is excellent, clear-toned and snappy. It is booked for release June 7th.

COMEDIES, TRAVELOGUES AND INDUSTRIAL SUBJECTS TO BE RELEASED BY GEORGE KLEINE FOR WEEK ENDING JUNE 1st.

Kleine's program this week appears very interesting; three good comedies, three exceptionally attractive scenics and a very remarkable exhibition of rope making by hand.

The release for Tuesday, May 28th, is a split reel composed of a rattling good comedy called "The Lottery of Love" and a beautifully colored short subject showing the many extremely interesting and magnificent "Fountains of Rome." There is a laugh in every foot in "The Lottery of Love"; the situations are consistent and well placed and handled in a highly amusing manner by the capable Cines comedians. It is one of the best this company has turned out for some time.

The Eclipse for May 29th is a typical farce-comedy which, regardless of its absurdity, will compel the laughs. "Slippery Tom" is the name of this comedy and it relates how the mischievous rogue successfully eludes the ever-pursuing police. Also on this real is an extremely interesting short subject showing in an entertaining manner "Rope Making by Hand in Kent, England." The process is seen from the raw hemp to the finished three-inch rope. To complete the reel is added a series of remarkable pictures called "Glimpses of Belgium," illustrating the picturesqueness of the important cities, wonderful canals and beautiful countryside.

The Cines for Saturday, June 1st, is a split reel extraordinary composed of a very entertaining and refined comedy called "The Bogus Professor," unusually well acted by the pick of the Cines Company, and relates with many laughable situations how an ingenious young man through a clever subterfuge outwits the opposition of the father of his lady-love. The subject that completes this reel, "Rome on the Tiber," is a gorgeously colored panorama of the interesting capital of Italy showing the many picturesque bridges which span its famous river; entertaining street scenes and sights of the city.

"THE PERIL" (Imp).

"The Peril" tells the story of a young officer who redeems himself from the consequences of disgrace in a manner alike creditable to his physical courage and with regard to the interests of his country.

Attempts have been made, and successfully made by a Japanese spy, to obtain secret information about some United States forts. The young lieutenant is on duty at the fort and, unfortunately, one night sits so late over a bottle at the club that he becomes intoxicated. In this plight he is discovered by his prospective father-in-law and threatened with court martial. However, before this calamity occurs, while in the commandant's home, the young officer discovers a thief, and this thief is none other than the disguised Japanese spy acting as butler in the commandant's home.

Scene from "The Peril" (Imp).

The lieutenant catches the butler in the act of stealing secret documents. There is a struggle; in the fight the spy is vanquished; the household is alarmed, and when the discovery of the lieutenant's fortunate save is made, he is restored to the good graces of the commandant and given the hand of his daughter. The lieutenant and the girl, by the way, had decided to elope.

In this picture there are some very fine scenes of military life in a United States fort. Also the Japanese spy is seen busy amongst the guns. Moreover, the scenes in the club and in the commandant's home give the Imp actors a chance of doing some very strong acting work.

King Baggot plays the part of the young lieutenant; Mr. Shay also has a military part; Mr. W. R. Daly is the disguised Japanese spy, and Violet Horner is the fiancee of Mr. Baggot. It was released May 30.

BET ON RIGHT.

Might is only strength, but right is power. Sometimes it's off on a vacation, but it always returns. Truth crushed to earth will rise again—and yeast and the dawn aren't in it with truth when it comes to rising. Wrong may be right for a while, but right is never wrong. The greatest asset in ourselves, the greatest solace of our souls, is faith in the right of things and courage in the night and fright of the fight toward the light.

Scene from "Grandfather's Clock" (Rex).

These obvious truths are expressed and emphasized in "Grandfather's Clock," a Rex morality picture, released Thursday, May 30th. The character delineation is delicate yet forceful, with a suggestion of honesty and earnestness running throughout that cannot be suppressed or subdued. The unscrupulous, dishonest brother portrays his sordid role with such artistic perfection and aesthetic impulse that we do not despise but rather pity him, and watch his malicious maneuvers with compassion rather than passion.

"Grandfather's Clock" is the truth!

A SIN OF OMISSION.

He was a society man. He tired of society. He went among the poor, just as a venture and adventure.

He met a poor girl who possessed a wealth of love yet to be lavished. Something in her soul responded to something in his. It was the first time she ever loved, but instinctively she knew it.

Scene from "Ashes of Hope" (Rex).

He omitted to tell her he was a society man. She thought he was their kind. She knew he was kind. So she loved him more and more.

Then he tired of the squalor and the denials. Said he was going elsewhere for work. Left.

A few weeks later she read the news in the papers—his marriage to an heiress. Broken heart—a sweet bud plucked by cruel, careless hands and cast upon the highway.

That's just what "Ashes of Hope," Rex release of Sunday, June 2nd, is, the reproduction of a slice of life.

"AN ARAB TRAGEDY" (Kalem).

An intimate glimpse of Oriental life and customs is given in the forthcoming picture made by the Kalem Company in Egypt under the title, "An Arab Tragedy." It is a simple story of Arab life told amid desert scenes that will prove of great interest to lovers of the photoplay. Fatima is the wife of Ayub Kashif, and basks in the luxury of the sumptous Arab establishment, for Ayub is a wealthy merchant. After several years of married life, Ayub becomes dissatisfied with his wife, because no child has been born, and he decides to cast her off and wed a slave girl who has been serving her. According to Arab custom, the discarded wife remains a member of the household, and is obliged to witness the presence of her rival who, having given birth to a child, is now the favorite.

Scene from "An Arab Tragedy" (Kalem).

Business takes Ayub on a long journey across the desert with a number of other merchants. On the way he is attacked by a dread disease and, unable to travel further, he is left to die, according to Mohammedan custom. A small shelter tent is erected in the sands of the desert, and Ayub and his camel and provisions are left with him.

Back in the harem, Fatima dreams of her husband's plight and, seeking his wife, begs her to send aid to him. But the favorite is not interested, so Fatima herself starts out in quest of her former lord and master. Ayub, realizing that death is near, prepares himself for the end, arraying himself in grave clothes always carried by Mohammedans on long journeys, he digs a shallow grave in the sand into which he drags himself. There he is found by Fatima who arrives at the last moment and is with Ayub when death overtakes him.

The picture is remarkable for the rich settings and desert scenes. Miss Gauntier takes the part of Fatima and Robert Vignola that of Ayub. Miss Alice Hollister is the merchant's second wife. As an example of the series of Egyptian pictures, this is one of the best that has yet been shown.

"A SQUAW MAN" (Champion).

The story of a wealthy young man's elopement with an Indian girl, the coming of the little papoose, the embarrassment and then desertion of the husband at the coming of the Indian chief to visit his daughter.

Then follows the return of the Indians to the West, the likewise arrival of the recalcitrant lover, husband and father, his escape in a barroom scuffle from the enraged cowboys, and nursing back to life by his faithful Indian wife. It is a startling story, with a cowboy chase, a fight on horseback, a sensational fall from a wildly galloping horse and clever bits of daring and deviltry. Released, Wednesday, June 5th.

"THE INTELLIGENT MUTT."

In the making of a photoplay a few weeks ago, Eddie Middleton, one of the directors of the Lubin stock companies, needed a tramp dog. A thoro' bred could be easily obtained at the dog stores, but a vagrant would have to be found. Several kiddies of the Latin quarter near the plant were put upon the quest and a reward of twenty-five cents offered for the worst mutt that could be presented. Among several, one was the real thing. He was a horrible specimen; coal black with a big head and a row of ribs that bulged from each side of his coat. The face was pitiful and he showed every sign of a bad season and starvation. The little Dago got his quarter and Middleton was delighted. The dog was put through the scene and filled all requirements. Not being on the salary list, he was rewarded with a good meal and then hustled out of the plant gate.

Next morning at 9 o'clock promptly with the other players, "Sloppy" turned up for engagement, forcing his way to the front he reported to Thomas Hopkins, the superintendent of the studio, and was promptly turned out. Still he lingered around and several times showed himself at the office door. Middleton was sent for and instructed to keep that dog away or, if necessary, to drown him in the tank. The director gave him another meal and again turned Sloppy out of the grounds.

Next morning the mutt was again on the job and, making his way to the superintendent's desk, offered a reminder of his presence by placing a hand on Mr. Hopkins' knee. The autocrat of the studio was furious and with some poetical language threw his hat at the tramp, while a score of players went into hysterics laughing. Sloppy then went in quest of Middleton and suggested breakfast, and again the director took him to the kitchen. For days promptly at 9 o'clock the dog reported and in the end perseverance prevailed. The property man of the plant has built a house for him and Sloppy is a member of the Lubin Stock Company.

A TWO-REEL HISTORICAL.

American Film Company Will Produce Big Feature Subject With Notable Players in Cast.

One of the really big feature pictures of the year will be announced by the American Film Mfg. Co. as the product of the newly completed Chicago studio, for release in the near future. This is a monster two-reel production, historically correct, and making use of such splendid American characters as Abraham Lincoln, Jefferson Davis, Zachary Taylor and General Winfield Scott; also an Indian whose name is a by-word in American history.

Jos. I. Sullivan, formerly of the Selig forces, is the newly engaged producer under whose management the film was produced. Mr. Sullivan did some remarkably good work in the selection of well-known actors to interpret the difficult parts of the play. Among those who will be seen in the role of great Americans will be the famous and inimitable Harry Lawnsdale, whose reputation in the role of Abraham Lincoln is nation-wide. Mr. Lawnsdale was formerly of the Selig forces, was with Nat Goodwin for a number of years and is known for his remarkable resemblance to the great President.

David Fischer, formerly of the American's Chicago company and also of Essanay, plays Jefferson Davis. Mr. Fischer is a splendid type, closely resembles Jefferson Davis, and will make a sensation, it is predicted, in that role. C. E. Gould, of comic-opera fame, was cast for General Winfield Scott.

Miss Barber plays Sarah Taylor, daughter of the then Col. Zachary Taylor, while Nell Morgan, formerly of the Essanay forces, plays Elizabeth Taylor, the younger sister. Geo. Cole, well known for his excellent work in "Paid in Full," "Man of the Hour" and "The Penalty," handles the difficult role of Zachary Taylor.

In Mr. Jos. I. Sullivan the American possesses a producer of reputation and wide experience. While at Selig's Mr. Sullivan produced "When Women Rule," "The Persistent Suitor," "When the Heart Rules," "The Little Match Seller," "The Vagabond," and many others. Mr. Sullivan will be remembered as having been the leading man at the Bush Temple, Chicago, for three seasons; Thanhouser, of Milwaukee, two years; Dearborn Stock, Chicago; Boyle Stock, Nashville, etc.

"JUST A BOY" (Solax).

Regardless of how happy one is likely to be in his environment, there comes a time when one hears the "call of the wild" and answers it with a joyously beating heart. Jack London knows the secret of the "call." It is irresistible. The man who has had small beginnings and is in prosperous surroundings occasionally hears the call as well as the country boy who has grown to be a city merchant. At some time in our busy existence the call comes to us, deafens us with its volume and forces us to respond.

Scene from "Just a Boy" (Champion).

"Shorty," who is the hero in "Just a Boy," the Solax release of Friday, May 31st, heard the call, although he was so well taken care of by his adopted mother. He couldn't resist it. He had to answer.

"Shorty" was ragged and dirty, but he thrived and was happy in his rags and filth. There came a time when a kind lady, who mourned the loss of her boy, gave him a clean home, away from the "dago's" banana stand and the toughs on the corners. But when his old pals saw him, they jeered at his "sissy" clothes and manners. These jeers went straight to "Shorty's" heart. And he went back to his rags and the street corners.

> "Oh blessed vision! happy child!
> Thou art so exquisitely wild,
> I think of thee with many fears
> For what may be thy lot in future years."

ALASKA-SIBERIA PICTURES OPEN IN NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA.

THE motion picture exhibition of the Carnegie Museum Expedition to the Arctic regions opened on Monday, May 20th, simultaneously in New York and Philadelphia. The Maxine-Elliot Theater is being used in Manhattan, and the Garrick Theater in Philadelphia. The pictures in New York are being lectured by Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt, who conducted the expedition through Alaskan and Siberian waters, and who took the pictures that are now on exhibition. In Philadelphia the pictures are being lectured by Mr. Clark, who was with Captain Kleinschmidt on the expedition, and who has an equally good understanding of Alaska in general, and of these pictures in particular.

A Moving Picture World reviewer was present at the exhibitions in New York and Philadelphia during the past week. The interest of the audiences in both cities in these remarkable pictures is very intense. Frequent applause punctuated the entertainments as the various spectacular or humorous incidents appeared. At all times the spectators were intently following the pictures and the speaker. In fact, so interested were the spectators, that in both Philadelphia and New York there came from the darkness of the auditorium numerous questions from persons in the audience who evidently wished to know all they could about different phases of Alaskan life. These questions were in all cases answered promptly and intelligently by the speaker; all of which lent an added interest to the entertainment and indicated a desire for knowledge on the part of those who came to see the pictures.

In a set of pictures like this, one would ordinarily not expect to find any humor whereby the pictures might possess an element of light and shade. However, there is plenty of fun sprinkled all through the six reels. There is both comedy and tragedy in the pictures. There are the humorous scramblings of Eskimaux to get out of range of the camera; there is the domestic drama of the sea-lions in their harems, trying to keep their wives from deserting them at the carpings of sea-lion Romeos or Lochinvars. Then there is the tragedy of the polar bear in her valiant fight to save the life of her cub. There is also shown the great struggle for food by these creatures of the Northland, who frequently die by thousands from starvation.

The walrus is a rare specimen and persons who have ever seen a walrus are about as rare as the walrus itself. Little is known generally of their habitat or way of living. All of these mysteries of nature in that part of the world are cleared up by Captain Kleinschmidt and his pictures, which all go to make the evening's entertainment not only an unparalleled lesson in natural history, but a geography lesson of rare value.

The metropolitan dailies, as a rule, have been very fair in their accounts of these pictures. One or two of them have expected a little too much in the way of photography. Those critics who expect photographs to come down out of the Arctic regions with the same clearness and steadiness as though taken at high noon on Fifth Avenue are probably men who do not know enough about photography to take an ordinary kodak snapshot under the most favorable conditions. Polar bears, mountain sheep, moose, reindeer, or Eskimaux do not stand still and "look pleasant" at the command of any photographer. Under the conditions of hardship in which they were taken, the pictures are extraordinary. They could have been taken by no one but a man who has spent years in the Arctic regions and who knows the language of the Eskimaux, their habits and the habits of bird and animal life, together with knowledge of meteorological conditions, to say nothing of a considerable knowledge of photography, combined with developing facilities in a frozen region where static electricity, the great bugaboo of the film maker, abounds, as it does in all cold climates. There is enough knowledge and interest in these pictures to repay anyone for the time and money expended in seeing them. Two more exhibitions will be opened Monday, May 27th, one at the Powers Theater in Chicago and another in Pittsburgh, Pa. Exhibitors living in those cities and in adjacent ones would do well to make a special trip to see these unexampled pictures. The exhibitions are given more for the benefit of exhibitors than for the public.

"THE ANGEL OF THE TRAIL" (Belmar).

After several weeks of untiring effort, fraught with many drawbacks occasioned by adverse weather conditions, "The Angel of the Trail," the first of a series of big feature photo-dramas to be made by the Henry Belmar Moving Picture Manufacturing Company, is ready for the screen.

"I have tried to make this picture worthy of my best efforts," said Mr. Belmar, president of the company and its chief director, when seen in his office at 1451 Broadway a day or so ago, "and after seeing it reproduced I feel that I have more than succeeded.

"I have been making motion picture plays for a number of years now, but never have I put the amount of thought and energy into a production that went into this. The result has repaid me; The Angel is sure to be a big success. In making this sweeping prediction, I am not depending on my judgment alone. A number of my critical friends have viewed the film, and were delighted with it.

"When our company decided to give our time to the making of big feature pictures, I determined to make my pictures the best in every detail regardless of time or expense. We ceased operations entirely for a time, and I personally supervised the improvements to our studio buildings at South Beach, S. I. We installed numerous devices, helpful in making large film productions.

Scene from "The Angel of the Trail" (Belmar).

"I then wrote the scenario of "The Angel," after which I directed my whole attention to getting together a company of actors who could handle the parts in a fitting manner.

"Laurel Love Belmar, whose past work in the picture field is well known, was retained as leading woman. The new members of our company comprise many notable film actors, among them Jefferson Osborne, Arthur Sprague, Walter Lewis, Howard Dorsay and others as well known.

"We were delayed greatly in 'making' 'The Angel' by rainy weather. Of course, under ordinary circumstances, there were many days we could have worked, but I was out for a record, so to speak, and I would take no chances; so we lost many days waiting for the ground to dry. This all entailed an enormous expense, which was greatly added to by the fact that a company of infantry and a detachment of cavalry were used in many of the scenes. In both cases we used the real article, even to procuring trained cavalry horses.

"This picture certainly caused lots of worry and work in the making, but now it is finished, and the result more than justifies the trouble."

A LETTER AND ITS ANSWER.

Spring Valley, Ill.,
5/13, 12.

Eclair Film Co.,
Fort Lee, N. J.

Gentlemen.—We seem to have quite a hard time getting Eclairs. I think Eclairs are perfect—you could not improve them. Never have I seen such superb and beautiful photography. I quit two exchanges because they would not furnish both American releases. The agent of Laemmle Film Service said they had no demand for Eclairs; he also said "Why, nobody likes American Eclairs because they are like American Pathes, that is, no good!"

That settled it with me. If Eclairs are like American Pathes, I want no better recommendation. I instantly decided that Eclairs were indeed perfect if they were just like American Pathes.

I want you to see that our theatre is placed on your mailing list and that I get every bit of advertising lobby displays that you issue. Sincerely,

C. H. Lynch, Rex Theatre.

Mr. C. H. Lynch,
Rex Theatre,
Spring Valley, Ill.

Dear Mr. Lynch.—Your frank letter of the 13th, regarding "Saved From the Titanic," is just received and pleased us very much.

There are indeed many misrepresentations made by certain exchanges; they are playing their own political games in the sale of films and they are very foolish to do so, when they try to interfere with really high-class productions. You are very wise to insist on first-class things yourself and will find that it will help you in the end. The public is more and more critical.

Now the explanation why some exchanges are not buying our films although there is a great demand for them and eventually they will be obliged to do it through the insistence of exhibitors, is this:

Most of the exchanges are themselves manufacturing and between them it is a matter of "You buy from us, and I buy from you," regardless of the quality or the demands of the exhibitors. In our case, we believe that better results come from specializing upon the quality of our productions.

Hoping to hear from you again and appreciating your interest, we are,

Cordially yours,
Eclair Film Co.

DAYLIGHT PICTURES FOR EVERY PROGRESSIVE THEATER OWNER.

What the "Eye Comfort System" of Indirect Illumination is, and Its Tremendous Importance to the Moving Picture Fraternity.

By Chas. E. Wittmack.

THEATRICAL men as a class were the first to realize that an exposed lighting unit in the range of vision greatly decreased the seeing efficiency of the eyes and for this very reason an exposed light is rarely seen on the stage, or in the auditorium while a play or picture is being shown.

In spite of the general realization by theatrical men of correct lighting, it is surprising how many picture house owners resort to the most unsatisfactory and irrational method of illumination, by placing optically injurious and irritating side lights in their places of amusement. Exposed lighting units at the ceiling are bad enough, but the use of wall brackets along the sides of interiors, directly in the range of vision, is probably the very worst practice possible.

Without question or doubt, the most vital problem the moving picture theater owner has had to contend with—the only remaining objection that the most critical could offer—is the dark house. The perfection of indirect illumination has solved the problem permanently, and has placed a completely lighted house, while the pictures were running—daylight pictures—within the reach of every theater manager, no matter what kind of a screen or machine he had installed. This last year has witnessed a complete revolution in the lighting of moving picture houses. It has been one of those few really radical changes which an entire business has welcomed with open arms, due solely to the tremendous opportunity it offered the keen business promoter to give to his patrons the very thing that the press and pulpit had been urging—sufficient light to enable the man at the back of the house to see every person in it.

Although indirect illumination is now a commercial possibility, I might say "necessity," it required twelve years of close study and careful experiment to bring the necessary appliances to the absolutely essential high state of perfection and efficiency the problem demanded. The basic principle of the indirect lighting idea is to conceal every light source from the range of vision by placing the lights in artistic bowls suspended from the celing, and then, using a light colored ceiling as a reflecting surface, to diffuse the light evenly throughout the interior. Now, to make the principle an economic success necessitated individual reflectors, one for each lamp in the bowl, which would direct all, the light against the ceiling and not waste any. And this, in turn, resulted in the perfection of the "X-RAY" reflector, the most powerful made; and this is the reflector used in the successful "Eye Comfort System" of indirect illumination.

These reflectors are one-piece glass blanks, corrugated, and these corrugations are scientifically designed to either concentrate or distribute the rays of light. They are plated with pure silver (not mercury), and backed with an enamel which expands and contracts in the same ratio as the glass when it is heated and cooled by the lamps being turned on and off.

Theater managers realize that attractive and comfortable surroundings are as necessary for the success of their enterprises as are flickerless pictures. They have always been ready to improve the objectionable lighting conditions and eliminate distracting exposed lights; but they have been handicapped by not being able to procure the proper appliances. Many different arrangements of lights and fixtures were tried, but the result was ever the same—some sort of exposed lights or exposed lights screened, were in the range of vision, where the eye would be attracted and the attention diverted from the picture being shown.

It would be interesting to sum up here the many advantages of this incomparable lighting system as applied to the moving picture house. First, and most important, folks are not blinded by the dark when entering the theater, nor are they blinded by the bright glare of the lobby nor the broad light of day, when leaving. Thus they are enabled to go direct from the box office to vacant seats without stumbling or falling over, and otherwise annoying, patrons already seated. The entire theater is literally flooded with a soft mellow glow, from light sources entirely concealed, which so permeates the entire house as to make every seat easily decernible from any point. Programmes may be read with utmost ease.

It does not take a very vivid imagination to see that, with indirect light installed, the theater immediately becomes a safe place. Not only is all panic and danger greatly reduced by having the auditorium light enough for everybody to see anything which may occur, and if necessary find their way out easily, but the lighted house is the worst enemy of roughnecks and mashers. There is a certain satisfaction in being able to see every person in the house all the time which every manager will immediately appreciate.

An indirect illumination system is so very simple to install and the fixtures are so comparatively inexpensive, that thousands of theater managers the country over are changing the lighting of their houses to indirect just as fast as possible. The demand for this form of illumination is so great that the producers are marketing their product quite generally through the electrical trade.

On interviewing one of the many managers who have installed this system in their theaters, he expressed it as his opinion that before very long every moving picture house in the country would be equipped with this system. Every one of the managers was enthusiastic in his praise of the "Eye Comfort System."

Another manager voiced the idea expressed at the beginning of this article, saying that a general movement on the part of motion picture theater managers for the installation of a lighting system that would give a subdued light, yet sufficient for all purposes, would eliminate the greatest objection to the picture house that has yet been encountered. "Those really interested," said he, "who are the very best friends of the motion picture business, have admitted that the idea of having the houses totally dark while the pictures were being run is altogether wrong and the cause of much agitation that otherwise would not be met. When managers have been ordered to keep their theaters lighted they have been forced to reply that they could not do this and show the pictures to advantage. Obstinacy in this respect on the part of theater managers has retarded advancement and has been responsible for some stringent laws. If the indirect system of lighting were generally installed, the principal objection to the picture theater would be immediately removed; for, not only would it furnish enough light, but it would be light of a kind that would not interfere with the pictures' clearness. It is remarkable that while the big fight has been made over the lighting proposition, managers are just beginning to realize that interior lighting is the most important feature of the business, with the exception of the quality of the films, and that even the best of films cannot be exhibited to advantage if wall lights are flashed from all parts of the theater. The cost of the installation of the system is a small item when the many advantages are considered and it is only a question of time when this system will be used in all theaters, just as it is now being used in the up-to-date houses, which are meeting with the greatest success."

Attention should be called to the fact, that, while excellent results are to be obtained with this system, an installation requires scientific planning and also the use of correct and efficient appliances. It must always be borne in mind that indirect illumination, of the successful kind, means a great deal more than merely turning a shade upside down. For this reason the manufacturers of the "Eye Comfort System" maintain a staff of competent experts, who specialize on the planning of installation, which service, by the way, is free.

NOTE

The making of this film at this particular time, is particularly timely, coming as it does in the time of the Dickens' Centenary. Taking advantage of the great interest in Dickens which culminated in the Dickens' Centenary, the General Film Publicity & Sales Co. selected "Oliver Twist" as the most dramatic of all the plays that have ever been made from Dickens' books, assembled a cast never before equalled in the world's history, and made a production that marks an epoch in film history.

Simplex The Peer of All Moving Picture Machines

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY:

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theaters.
ARTHUR S. WHITE, Manager Moving Picture Department, Percy G. Williams Circuit of theaters.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
WM. J. GANE, Manhattan Theater.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theaters. WALTER ROSENBERG, Savoy Theater.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
HARRY LEVINE, Manager, Riverside Theater.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. STERN, Proprietor, Bleecker Theater.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. CRANE, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.
W. D. KOLLE, Prospect Hall, Brooklyn.

It is the best we have ever used and we have ordered two more for our other theaters.

SALES CO. PROGRAM NOT AFFECTED BY WITHDRAWAL OF SOME MEMBERS

To Exhibitors:

The withdrawal from the Sales Co. of a number of manufacturers does not affect the high aims and principles of the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Co. nor the quality of the weekly program.

Other brands of film are being substituted for those that have withdrawn. Among them are the Victor, in which Florence Lawrence appears under the direction of Harry Salter, who directed all Imp and Lubin productions in which she has appeared, and the Gem, directed by George Nichols, until recently director of the Thanhouser Co., and prior to that of the Biograph Co. The Itala Co. resumes its releases of one reel subjects produced by well organized stock companies which cater to the American market. The "101" Bison stock company has added new directors and actors and is issuing one reel subjects of the same quality as its feature two and three reel films. Release dates are now being fixed for a large number of sensational and spectacular two and three reel subjects.

A glance at the new Sales Co. program should convince every exhibitor that he will receive from this company better subjects than ever before.

VITAGRAPH.

WHO'S TO WIN (June 3).—Mrs. Briggs keeps a boarding house. Bloggs, a retired sea captain, and Lang, a retired lawyer, are the two "star boarders." Mr. Mills is a mild, affable man, and everybody's friend. Lang and Bloggs are both laying seige to the landlady's heart. Bloggs comes home one evening and brings her a bouquet. Lang goes one better by producing theater tickets and inviting her to go to the theater. Bloggs goes to the theater, too, and glowers at them from the balcony. Coming home, after having drowned his feelings in the flowing bowl, and finding Mrs. Briggs and Lang seated by the fire, he upbraids her with breaking his heart and insults Lang. Mills comes down and persuades Lang to go to bed.

Lang then demands that Bloggs be turned out of the house. Mrs. Briggs refuses and weeps. Mills returns, again acts as peace-maker and gets Lang to retire, whereupon Mrs. Briggs bursts into tears on his shoulder and tells him what a comfort he is. The next morning, Lang and Bloggs, both penitent, on the advice of Mills, go out and purchase bouquets as a peace offering to Mrs. Briggs. While making their purchases, they decide to go to Mrs. Briggs together and ask her to choose between them. They do so, only to find that in the meantime, Mrs. Briggs and Mills, the mild and affable, have come to an understanding, and she is going to marry him. So they have to make the best of a bad bargain and attend the wedding as best men, but with the expressions of chief mourners.

THE PRAYERS OF MANUELO (June 4).—Manuelo, a poor Mexican, ill with fever and newly married, is penniless. He gets up from his bed and goes to the nearest town to find food. Having no money, he steals a few beans and is kicked out as a "lazy Greaser." He returns to his wife. While they are talking the matter over, a rancher from the mountains comes to their door and offers him a job as a sheep herder. His wife bravely urges him to go.

Once in the mountains, he is treated like a dog. In his dreams, he has a vision, suggestive of his wife, with a new born babe. His mind is disturbed and he longs to go to her. He asks for a leave of a few days. The head herdsman refuses his request. Manuelo bides his time and at night he steals away. He walks miles and miles. His strength fails and he sinks down towards evening near an open field. In this field a horse is tethered. He takes the animal and rides away. The owner sees him. He calls his men, who bring their horses and a rope; they ride in hot pursuit.

The Mexican reaches his home. As he dismounts his pursuers shoot; his right arm falls limp at his side. His followers knock furiously at the door. Getting no response, they throw it open. They stand spell-bound upon the threshold. They see the Mexican reverently kneeling before a couch, his limp arm by his side, the other encircling his wife and their new born babe—above the bed the Image of the Virgin, a candle burning beneath, like a pervasion of spiritual blessing. Beholding, the pursuers bow their heads and depart, leaving Manuelo and his loved ones in peace.

MOCKERY (June 5).—In the Middle Ages, Prince Dionio, of Italy, is affianced to Princess Dolorosa. At their first meeting, Pepito, the Jester of Dionio's court, falls in love with the princess. He forgets his ill-shapen body and personality in the yearning of his heart. At the wedding feast of Dionio and Dolorosa, the jester cannot conceal his jealousy, and even after her marriage, he would feign court the princess. Lorenzo, the court physician, observes the hideous attenions of Pepito and asks, "What right has a shriveled fool like you to admire the princess"? This cuts him to the quick and when the princess mocks his love, he vows vengeance.

He arouses the jealousy of Dionio against Lorenzo, calling to his notice the meeting between the physician and the princess, when she generously gives Lorenzo money in aid of her plague-stricken subjects. This is the beginning of the tragic climax which the jester succeeds in bringing about. The fool forges a note from the doctor, making a clandestine meeting with the princess. This he gives to the prince; then placing Lorenzo's medicine case beside the sleeping princess, whom he carefully covers with a velvet spread, he tells the prince that the physician is asleep in one of the adjoining court chambers, and by subtle insinuation and thought suggestion, leads Dionio to stab the princess, thinking she is the court physician. When Dionio discovers his mistake, with the same dagger he stabs himself, falling dead over the lifeless form of his wife. The jester gloatingly triumphs over the vengeance which he has brought upon his hated mockers.

THE CYLINDER'S SECRET (June 7).—Employed as secretary to Howard Abele, Majorie Abbott attracts the attention of Sydney, her employer's son, who falls desperately in love with her. Mr. Abele is strenuously opposed to their marriage and he quarrels with his son. Majorie has a half-brother, Dave, who is of an inventive turn of mind. Sydney has introduced him to Mr. Abele, who becomes interested in the young man and tries to promote a mechanical device which Majorie's brother has submitted to him. The young fellow imagines that his benefactor is holding his invention and trying to get possession of it himself. He demands money from Mr. Abele.

One day, just as Mr. Abele has started his dictograph to dictate a letter, Dave, Majorie's brother, enters. He quarrels with the millionaire, and in passion, kills him. The dictograph has registered all that has passed between them and the threats of the murderer. Sydney Abele is arrested on suspicion of having killed his father. As his trial is progressing, Marjorie, who has read the record of the dictograph, brings the machine into court, and it gives the evidence which frees Sydney. Just as he has been acquitted, Dave, the guilty man, rushes into the court room and confesses his guilt. The great excitement of the moment and the strain of remorse has so devitalized his strength and affected his heart, he drops dead into the arms of an officer of the court.

HALF A HERO (June 8).—Joe Godfrey is only half a hero, but Mabel Kemp loves him. Mabel's father is an old G. A. R. man and sternly sets his foot down against Joe, calling him a coward because he has not done a deed of bravery to prove himself anything else. Mabel and Joe manage to get together and exchange notes in the groceries which she and her father purchase from the store where Joe works. The old man, in order to keep Mabel away from her lover, goes to the store himself, little knowing that he is acting as love's emissary, carrying in one of the packages Joe's message to Mabel.

Joe plans an elopement and considers himself a hero to defy his future father-in-law and carry off his daughter. Mabel makes all preparations to get away with Joe. He is just assisting her from an upper window when some rubbish catches fire and fills the house with smoke, which arouses the father, who is busily reading in the lower part of the house. Rushing out doors, he cries for help and some one to save his daughter. Just then Joe appears in the window with Mabel in his arms, amid the cheers of the crowd and the belated fire department. He is hailed as a hero and receives the consent of Mabel's father to their marriage.

EDISON.

THE WESTMINSTER KENNEL CLUB DOG SHOW, NEW GRAND CENTRAL PALACE, NEW YORK CITY (June 1).—There were almost two thousand dogs of every kind and description shown at this exhibition and it is claimed to be the biggest and largest dog show in the world. The North of Europe and Greenland furnish some of the most extraordinary specimens, such as Russian Wolf Hounds, Samoyedes, Esquimau dogs and Boar Hounds, all noted for their bravery and fierceness.

Toy dogs, such as Spaniels, Royal Pekingese, Japanese, Fox Terriers and Poodles were to be seen in numbers of every variety and breed.

Two of the most interesting were a pair of French police dogs who had done service with the police force in the city of Paris and who by instinct are able to tell an evil-doer. For sagacity they are not to be equaled. Bull dogs, Blood hounds, Collies and Sheep dogs, in the pride of conscious aristocracy, bask in the sunshine of warm admiration.

EDDIE'S EXPLOIT (June 1).—Eddie, all dressed up for the party, is admonished by his mother not to get his clothes soiled and she also tells him that if he does he cannot go to the party with his little sister. Well, the same thing that happened to you in the past or, if you are young, very recently, happens to poor little Eddie and no one but Rowdy did it. Consequently he is not allowed to go to the party with his little sister.

Eddie's little heart is broken. As a punishment, his mother forbids him to leave the house. He sits on the front stoop and confides to Rowdy the weariness of this world's troubles and Rowdy, like the good playfellow that he is, listens. Eddie gets a pencil and paper and writes a farewell note to his mother; slips it under the door; whistles to Rowdy and together they leave for the woods.

Eddie seeks a high place on a granite boulder. Rowdy, full of spirits, wants to play, and in the scuffl Eddie falls down the front of the sheer cliff. Rowdy comes down the winding path at the cry of distress from his little master and taking the hat which Eddie gives him, runs home to tell his mother. We see the intelligent animal on a dead run to Eddie's home and when he gets to the front door he yelps and scratches till some one comes. Then he brings the mother and the maid straight to the place where Eddie is hanging, head downwards, caught by his heel. He is rescued and taken home, where a doctor pronounces him more scared than hurt. He sits up and begs forgiveness for disobedience—a trait of which he is undoubtedly permanently cured.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING (June 4).—Mr. Lord, President of the International Food Products Company, objects to the attachment which has sprung up between his daughter Mildred, and his private secretary, Tracy, and tells the young people that matrimony, on Tracy's slender salary, is out of the question.

Mildred's pleas that she would be quite happy in the role of a poor man's wife, are promptly rejected. Mildred, however, unknown to her father, starts on a career of economy by which she hopes to be able to learn to live within Tracy's means. She receives a terrible shock at the outset when she learns the cost of food stuffs and then and there decides that the cost of living is too high.

She evolves a plan to remedy this evil and laying it before the General Federation of Women's Clubs, is hailed as the modern Joan D'Arc. The plan is a simple one. A list of food products is made with each item numbered. This list is sent to every member of the United States with instructions to refrain from buying any article whose number appears in the daily papers.

Mildred, finding the price of butter and eggs very high, sends the proper numbers to the Associated Press. These numbers appear the next day in all the newspapers, and the women all over the country refuse to purchase either. At the office of the International Food Products Company there is consternation. All orders for butter and eggs have been cancelled and after a day or two of stagnation, Lord is compelled to lower the price. This action is at once followed by enormous sales all over the country. Mildred lays in a store of butter and eggs at reduced prices and her first economical venture is a huge success for she has saved exactly three dollars and forty-six cents.

The next attack is upon bacon. The result is the same. There is no demand for bacon and Lord is furious. The mysterious numbers in the papers only add fuel to the flame until one day Mildred explains her great scheme for economizing, shows him a list of her savings and again asks his consent to her marriage.

At last Lord sees daylight. Comparing his three days' shrinkage of sales of over one hundred thousand dollars to Mildred's savings he decides that it will be cheaper to raise Tracy's salary than to have her continue her economy. This he does and presents the pair with a number of shares of stock in the company with the parting injunction to stop economizing.

VERY MUCH ENGAGED (June 5).—Reuben, the village cut-up, in love with all the pretty girls, while on a visit to the big city one day, conceives the idea of bringing home something to give the girls as souvenirs. Being at a loss to know just what to buy, he is attracted by a street fakir selling imitation solitaires at ten cents apiece, so he invests the magnificent sum of fifty cents for five rings. On his return to his home village he pays court to five girls and makes each in turn a present of a ring, thinking it a huge joke, while on the other hand the girls take the matter quite seriously and consider themselves engaged.

At a barn dance one evening the five girls meet and notice the similarity of the rings, compare notes and to their utter dismay discover that they have been deceived. They confront Reuben and demand an explanation. He is unable to give any and for a moment consternation reigns supreme, but in the height of the excitement he manages to escape. The next day four girls enter the village attorney's office with the firm determination of bringing damage suits for blighted affections. The fifth girl, a pretty maid servant, is dragged into the controversy but refuses to bring suit. Upon interrogation the attorney discovers that no promise of marriage had been made, therefore there are no grounds for a breach of promise suit.

The attorney subsequently meets Reuben, describes the attitude the girls have taken and incidentally mentions the pretty maid servant who held aloof from the rest. Upon learning this Reuben really falls in love with the pretty maid servant, proposes to her and is accepted. They repair to the parsonage where the happy pair are made one.

An old village gossip spreads the news that Reuben is about to marry the maid servant, whereupon the jilted girls enter the parsonage and endeavor to prevent the marriage—but too late. The ceremany has been performed and the four girls leave in a jealous rage while Reuben smilingly sallies forth with his bride on his arm.

THE MAN WHO MADE GOOD (June 7).—Young Trotter had lost a good position as reporter on one of the big Metropolitan dailies and to all his applications came the same answer—they had no place for a man out of a job. They wanted men who could produce the goods and he was curtly told to make good first.

Trotter was reduced to doing his own cooking in the little 2 x 4 bedroom, and knowing he would be ejected if caught, was in the habit of disposing of the remnants of his scanty meals by carefully wrapping them in newspapers and, under cover of darkness, slipping them into some convenient ash can. Seeing an officer approaching as he was in the act of disposing of his parcel in this manner one evening and, not wishing to be questioned, he stepped into a doorway until the officer had passed. As he stepped forward again to drop his parcel, a man passing by quietly dropped a similar bundle into the can and without stopping went his way. Something in the stranger's manner aroused Trotter's curiosity and, taking up the package the stranger had left, he hurried to his room. Upon opening it he was disgusted to find only a lot of dried plaster and bits of stone; but some shiny particles caught his eye. They turned out to be bits of steel shavings. They and the stranger's queer manner aroused his suspicions. The next night he followed the man and saw him enter a small basement shop over which hung a plumber's and electrican's sign. Trotter determined to see the inside of the shop, so, under pretext of having a bell repaired, he visited it. The man could not fix the bell, so Trotter had to leave. Waiting until the stranger had gone out again, Trotter entered by means of a skeleton key. Making his way into the back room he found a tunnel leading into the next building. Cautiously entering this he found himself confronted by a steel wall, which plainly showed the attacks of the drill. The steel wall must be the vault of the City National Bank next door. His duty was clear, he must notify the bank at once. But once out in the air his brain cleared. His duty was to himself first and he raced to the office of the daily. He outlined his story to the editor, who was at first sceptical but finally, persuaded by Trotter's earnestness, told him to go ahead.

Trotter did go ahead, captured his burglar single-handed after a desperate strugle, landed the biggest scoop of the year, and the much coveted berth on the staff of the paper.

THE SHADOW ON THE BLIND (June 8).—Harry Furniss and his young daughter live across the way from an autocratic old gentleman who has a son. The young people fall in love promptly and, of course, the autocratic father has other plans for his heir. One night he sees the shadow of his son and the young woman opposite thrown in strong relief upon the blind and promptly sends after the youth bidding him reserve his attentions for the lady of wealth already chosen for him. When the young man reports this to the artist and his daughter, the artist in a spirit of mischief and to help the young lovers, seats the girl before the blind and sketches her silhouette thereon. Consequently the stern parent across the way sees the young girl apparently alone, at least her shadow is there, and little dreams that the young people may be enjoying themselves in quite another part of the room. The artist's father carries his role of match-maker a little farther. Dressing his daughter in exaggerated suffragette get-up, he makes a caricature sketch of her which is sent to the young man signed with the name of the woman picked out by his father. As the real Miss Golding is unknown to either father or son, save as the daughter of an old friend of the father, this portrait easily passes for what it seems. Consequently, when pretending to go to the train to meet Miss Golding, the young man brings back the girl who looks like the portrait in a measure. The old father hurries up wedding preparations and demands that his son marry the girl at once. The ceremony is hardly over before the real Miss Golding appears upon the scene and explanations are in order. As the real little bride is attractive and the real Miss Golding is not, the old father is not so difficult to persuade in the end.

MISSIONARIES IN DARKEST AFRICA (June 3).—The Rev. Elbert Lawrence, feeling his duty lies farther south among the savage tribes of Africa, departs with his daughter from the settlement near Luxor, Egypt, to a new scene of labor. Several weeks later the missionaries arrive at their new field. At the first religious service, the natives show considerable interest and the chief orders all his tribesmen to attend. The chief wins Faith's confidence and begs for private instructions. While Faith is doing her best to teach the dusky African, he, on his part, is falling desperately in love with the white girl and determines that she shall be his wife.

The chief brings presents and asks the Rev. Lawrence for the hand of his daughter. When his gifts are refused and his suit declined, he orders his tribesmen to fall upon the missionary and they take the girl captive. They arrive at the village of the tribe on the desert and Faith, recognizing her danger, decides to take her own life, thus surrendering her soul to the keeping of her Maker.

THE DRUMMER GIRL OF VICKSBURG (June 5).—Alma's brother, leaving for the front, gives her a final lesson on the drum. Six months later the young drummer boy is brought home dead. Grief-stricken at her brother's death, Alma determines to take his place. Dressing herself in his clothes, she enlists in the Confederate army but is recognized by an old friend, Lieutenant Lightfoot, who promises to keep her secret.

The morning of a great battle arrives. Col. Summers, a Federal officer, is ordered to place a gun on the extreme left flank. The company of which Alma is the drummer is ordered to silence this Federal cannon which is dealing out a veritable hail of death. The Confederates charge, drive off the Federals, and Alma, though wounded, succeeds in spiking the gun. Alma is picked up from the field by Northern soldiers and taken to a Federal hospital. Two weeks later an exchange of prisoners brings about a double wedding.

THE PUGILIST AND THE GIRL (June 7).—Velma and Tom become engaged, but in a few days they have a quarrel. A few evenings later, at a society dance, Velma is impressed with the dancing of Jack, a new arrival, and Tom becomes violently jealous. Calling a few of his cronies together, a plot is fixed up against Jack. A note is sent to that worthy person, which is intercepted by Velma's father, who goes looking for trouble—and finds it. Then more plots are made against Jack, but Tom and his friends receive a great surprise. A challenge is sent to Jack to meet Tom in a boxing match. Reluctantly the young man accepts and after the affair Tom is carried home badly battered. The next day Jack calls to extend his sympathy and say good-bye as he is about to leave town. When he has departed, Tom picks up the visitor's card and finds to his terror that the stranger is a middle weight champion.

ON EL MONTE RANCH (June 4).—Dave Trent is employed on the Big C ranch and lives with his sister, Mary, a charming girl. Jim Andrews, foreman of the ranch, loves Mary, and one morning calls to put the engagement ring on her finger. While they are talking, Dave calls his sister off to one side and begs some money from her. She gives him what little she has, and watches him depart with a doubtful shake of her head. Dave is not getting along well. An hour later Dave sits in a poker game with the cowboys and is caught cheating. The boys drag him before Jim, declaring they will not work on the same ranch with a cheat and demand his discharge. This Jim does, although he realizes what a blow it will be to Mary. However, Dave now goes to Mary and tells her Jim discharged him because expenses were to be cut down. Consequently when Jim calls Mary angrily rebukes him and Jim, realizing she must now know the truth, is forced to take back his ring and depart in silence. Dave now meets with a renegade Mexican and enters into a cattle-rustling scheme. They are detected, captured and are about to be strung up, when Jim gets the boys to agree to send them across the county line. Dave is duly thankful, writes a note to Mary telling of Jim's great kindness and promises to come back a better man. Jim takes the note to Mary and it is only a matter of a few moments until the engagement ring is back again on her finger and she is clasped in his loving embrace.

THE LEGACY OF HAPPINESS (June 6).—Allen Gordon, a young clerk, is discontented and longs for great wealth. His discontentment causes his sweetheart to break their engagement, as his lust for money would only make her miserable. That evening in his room, Gordon falls asleep and has a startling dream. He receives a telegram from his lawyer, advising him that his uncle in Italy has suddenly died and left him one million dollars. Upon receipt of the money Gordon adopts a life of ease, dons expensive clothes and is introduced into society by his lawyer. Here he meets Will Graft, a foppish dude, who instantly schemes to marry his sister to Gordon. A few evenings later a brilliant social function is held at the Graft home and Gordon is the guest of honor. During the course of the evening Will's sister enchants him with every trick and artifice within her power and Gordon, enraptured with her charms, puts an engagement ring upon her finger. A few moments later he is shocked to hear her boasting of her conquest to her mother and brother and to hear Will congratulate her upon landing him. Seeing through their deceit, Gordon now arranges with his lawyer to send a fake telegram announcing his fortune has been swept away in disastrous speculation, and determines to prove his fiancee's love. The telegram is delivered to him at the Graft home, and the engagement is immediately broken. While the servant is bringing his coat, Gordon now sternly rebukes the sneering brother, strikes him in the face with his glove and departs—and the dream ends. With a start Gordon arouses, and he is delighted to find it has all been only a fancy. Cured of his discontent he hastens to his sweetheart's home, restores the ring on her finger and joy once more fills their lives.

BILLY CHANGES HIS MIND (June 7).—Billy McGrath is fortunate enough to rescue Ethel Woodby from a ferocious bulldog one fine morning. Now Ethel is a most charming girl and Billy gallantly promises to call next evening. To make this certain Ethel sends him her photo as a reminder and Billy worships at the shrine. He manages to dress in a hurry and starts for the Woodby home with all haste. Meanwhile Ethel's parents have looked up the social standing of Billy and learn he is wealthy and unmarried, also a member of the city's most exclusive clubs. Billy arrives in the outer hall, knocks in vain, finds the door slightly ajar and walks in. Finding no one about he sits down to wait and suddenly discovers he has come off without his waistcoat! Now full dress without a waistcoat is most embarrassing and Billy determines to rush back to his rooms and complete his toilet. But someone is coming and he is forced to take refuge in a small adjoining room and hears most astonishing things in consequence. He sees Ethel and her parents enter, and is forced to listen while they warn her to be sure and capture him, as she ought to realize she is very near the age-limit and Billy is very wealthy. Then he sees Ethel coach her younger sister in the role of maid and watches while she rehearses how she will receive him. Of course he is horrified and realizes he must escape at once from such a party of plotters. The hours go by and Ethel falls asleep waiting. Billy now roughly disguises himself as a burglar and tries to steal out but is detected by Ethel, whose screams bring her father and Billy is forced to fight for his liberty. He manages to escape without revealing his identity, but sadly rumpled in mind and attire. Reaching his rooms Billy is thoroughly disgruntled, when a bunch of his pals enter before he can get out of his torn clothes and begin to joke him unmercifully. Next day Ethel receives a letter from Billy regretting he was unable to call as he has been suddenly summoned to darkest Africa and does not expect to return.

A CHILD OF THE PURPLE SAGE (June 8).—Bart Darrow, a young cowboy, is engaged to pretty Betty King and has put the engagement ring on her finger. Betty promises to always be true and Bart departs joyfully. In the town saloon he sets up the drinks in honor of the occasion. Meanwhile Betty's brother introduces her to a young stranger and it is a case of love at first sight between the two. They are standing out at the mail-box hand in hand when a prospector rides past who is a staunch friend of Bart. Finding Bart in the saloon he tells him what he has seen and Bart is furious. He calls at the King ranch, rebukes Betty for her infidelity and she angrily returns the ring. Bart leaves heart-broken. Years later Bart is sent out of the county by the sheriff for his lawless depredations. Out in the desert he rides and is seeking for a spot to bunk for the night when he suddenly sees a covered wagon in the distance. Riding up he finds a little girl weeping over the dead body of her mother. Tenderly Bart takes the child in his arms, then sees a letter in the dead woman's hand There are only two lines, but they are enough to tell him the poor wasted form was once his sweetheart, Betty, and that he was going to her brother's home with her little girl after the death of her husband. For a moment Bart bows his head in silent grief with the little one clasped in his arms. The first shadow of night is upon the desert when he rides slowly away from the lone grave. Reaching an abandoned shack, Bart makes a bunk for the child with his horse-blankets and tucks her in. But the spirit of the dead mother causes the little one to climb from the bed and kneel in prayer and Bart, for the first time in his rough life, bows his head in solemn communion

ECLIPSE.

IN DAYS OF OLD (June 5).—Diana, the pretty daughter of the Duke de Granard, is on her way to the convent, escorted by Captain Latour, when a band of horsemen set upon them and carry Diana off.

Brissac and his servant, Louis, find the captain in despair, and offer their assistance. Suspecting that the maiden has been carried to the castle of Baron Morna, the three immediately set out in pursuit.

Arriving at the castle, they disguise themselves as minstrels, and are readily admitted and allowed to give a performance. They are secretly recognized, however, and when they retire for the night Morna and his men rush in to slay them, but by a clever trick the supposed minstrels overcome the intruders and make them prisoners.

Finding out where the unfortunate maiden is confined, they speedily effect her release. And after thanking their gallant benefactors, Diana and her escort start joyfully on their way.

CINES.

THE TRIFLER (June 4).—Josie imagines herself in love with Anthony and accepts his addresses, and at the same time repulses Lucian, who is madly in love with her. Lucian plots revenge, and after discovering the meeting place of the lovers, cleverly uses his camera to good effect; obtaining several photographs of rather tender situations.

The next day he shows these to Josie and threatens to inform her father, 'but suddenly seems to change his mind and destroys the prints, proving that he is a gentleman who would not take an unfair advantage. He then proudly leaves the room.

Josie begins to think better of Lucian, and later when she receives a note from him stating that he is about to take his own life rather than live without her, she, unsuspicious that it is but a ruse, rushes to save him and joyfully throws herself into his arms.

PICTURESQUE SCENES IN PADUA (June 4).—A charming scenic, showing the Ragione Palace, St. Anthony Church, the banks of the river Bacchiiglione, and many other places of interest.

SCENES OF THE TURKISH-ITALIAN WAR (June 8).—Artillery bombarding the Turkish positions to prepare the forward movement of the Italian troops. Artillery officers directing the firing with the telemetre. Cavalry reconnoitering. Intrenching during the night. Flanking squads. Marching forward to Bir-Tobras. Clearing the oasis. On the look-out at sunset. Repeating guns on battery. The bombardment of Zuara. The protected cruiser "Carlo Alberto" shelling Zuara. Checking the firing. The 10-inch guns in action. The commanding officer of the "Carlo Alberto" pointing the guns. The shelling goes on. Empty gun cartridges. The effect of the shelling on Zuara. At full speed toward the coast. GHOSTS AT CIRCLE X CAMP (June 13).—Dalrymple, a tenderfoot, seeking work, locates on a ranch The cowboys plan to initiate him and the bully, being the toughest man, agrees to handle the newcomer. At the table the fun starts when the bully offers him a drink of kerosene out of a whiskey bottle, which he accepts. But one mouthful tells the tale. After dinner he is invited out to the corral, where a trick donkey takes the final part in the iniation. The tables turn when the tenderfoot bets that his tormentor dare not stay in the haunted house. The bet is accepted. The tenderfoot replaces the cartridges in the bully's gun with blanks. The bully, becoming afraid, pays a negro to go with him and, after searching the premises, they sit down. The tenderfoot, who has disguised himself as a ghost, appears and scares the negro away. The bully next seeing him, pulls out his gun, opens fire, but as the bullets have no effect he takes to his heels, the ghost after him. Almost frightened to death he jumps into a stream and after a good wetting he looks up only to see the disguised tenderfoot laughing at him.

A ROMANCE OF THE BORDER (June 3).—Pedro, a young Mexican ranchman, in love with Rita, the pretty daughter of Sergeant Blake, and is regarded with favor by the brave old fighter. Captain Field, an unscrupulous officer, engaged Rita in conversation when he called at the Sergeant's quarters one day and, without her knowledge and in a spirit of deviltry, cuts off a lock of her hair. The Sergeant, returning to his quarters, witnesses the scene between his daughter and the Captain, and knowing the latter's reputation, also realizing that their difference in station can place only one construction on Captain Field's attention to Rita, he forbids him to again address his daughter. One night at the officer's club, Field, who has been drinking, boasts of his conquest of the Sergeant's daughter. Sergeant Blake, who has come into the room with a message for one of the officers, overhears his remarks and starts to resent them. He is stopped by the other officers present who, while their sympathies are all with the old soldier, do not want to see him get into trouble.

Leaving the club, Blake accidentally meets Pedro, to whom he relates what has occurred. Wild with anger at the slight put upon his sweetheart, Pedro declares he will kill Field. Sergeant Blake forbids this and tells the young Mexican that it is his duty to resent the insult. Blake waits until the Captain comes from the club and follows him. Disregarding Blake's instructions, Pedro, who has been hiding in the background, follows the two men. Blake overtakes the Captain and a quarrel ensues, in the course of which Field overpowers the old man and, taking his revolver from him, orders him to his quarters. There is nothing left for Blake to do but obey. Pedro, who has witnessed the entire scene, is wild with rage to see the Sergeant defeated. He draws his revolver and fires, killing the Captain. Next morning the dead body is found, with Sergeant Blake's revolver beside it. The Sergeant is placed under arrest and finally tried by court-martial on the charge of murder. As sentence is about to be pronounced Pedro surprises the court by appearing and confessing that he was the guilty party. The soldiers start to arrest him, but Pedro manages to slip through their clutches and darts through the gates of the corral. With the start thus gained, Pedro manages to get across the Mexican line, safe from his pursuers. In view of the Mexican's confession, there is nothing left for the court to do but acquit Sergeant Blake, which they are glad to do.

DREAM OF A MOVING PICTURE DIRECTOR (June 5).—A photoplay is wanted quick. The manager calls in the director to give him one in a hurry. The director shows him several scripts, but they do not suit; so the director is compelled to call the scenario writer to have a play written in an hour. The director summons his company and reads the play to them; then tells them to make up, while he gives his plots to the stage manager. Being weary, he falls asleep in a chair in the center of the stage and dreams the following:

A young girl, employed in an office, falls in love with the head clerk. The boss is a black moustached villain, who is also in love with the girl. To make an impression he gives her his photo, which she throws with contempt on the table. He then tries to embrace her. She calls for help, when her sweetheart (the head clerk) comes to her rescue. At this juncture, the heavy man is not strong enough in the part and the director stops the play and shows him what to do. The play is resumed, the "heavy" throws the head clerk into a vault and locks him in, then embraces the girl, who repulses him and runs. The clerk by his superior strength batters down the steel vault door and escapes. The "heavy" pursues the unfortunate girl up the fire-escape to the roof, then to the water tower, where she defends her honor by beating him over the head with an iron rod. Fearing she has killed him she makes her retreat, only to be pursued by the villain. Rushing to the edge of the roof, she sees her lover, and calls him. He tells her to jump. She does so and alights safely in his arms, Undaunted, the villain, saying she shall not escape me, leaps six stories to the ground. Landing uninjured, he starts in pursuit. Here is where the detective takes up the trail, and after a long chase catches the villain. The stage hands, in setting the stage, allow a piece of scenery to fall upon the director, which awakens him from his dream.

A HUSBAND'S AWAKENING (June 6).—Valmar, young Vicomte de Soigny, finds himself much in debt and goes to his mother for aid. She promises to pay his debts if he will marry a young neighbor, Georgette Bourcet. Valmar refuses at first, as Georgette is a plain, demure creature, but as his mother insists, he consents. The Vicomtesse arranges the bethrothal, and Valmar leaves that night for Paris, where he enjoys a month of freedom. Georgette is already in love with the handsome Vicomte and to her the marriage seems wonderful, but when they have settled in their Paris home she is not happy. Valmar is not attentive and finds her unattractive. One day Madame Lyse, an old friend of Valmar, calls out of curiosity to see his wife. Valmar says that Georgette is not at home and entertains the fair visitor. Georgette sees them together and, when Valmar refuses to remain at home with her that evening, she tells him she overheard his remark to Mme. Lyse and reproaches him. Valmar becomes angry, telling her that he does not love her and accusing her of marrying him for his title. Then he leaves her. Georgette is heartbroken. Herr Ludwig, her music master, tries to comfort her. She confides in him how she yearns for her husband's love, and together they plan to win the Vicomte's affection. She attends to her toilet and Herr Ludwig arranges her studies. This little country girl becomes beautiful and brilliant. On his return, Valmar attends a ball and immediately goes to Mme. Lyse's side, but soon leaves to find the possessor of the beautiful voice he hears. Great is his astonishment to find the singer to be his wife. It seems impossible that this beautiful creature, superbly gowned and wonderfully self-possessed should be plain, shy Georgette. Madame La Vicomtesse finishes her song and graciously receives the applauses. Calmly greeting her husband, she leaves on the arm of an admirer. Valmar follows her home and tries to make love. Though she still loves him, Georgette continues to treat him coolly and succeeds in arousing his jealousy. When Valmar angrily denounces her as a flirt and roughly kisses her, she realizes that he is hers at last. The next morning Georgette tells her music master of her success and locks the door. When Valmar tries to enter he is surprised to find the door locked. Georgette hurriedly gets Herr Ludwig away and opens the door. Valmar becomes suspicious and finds Ludwig's forgotten gloves. His angry outburst is interrupted by a servant entering with a note for Georgette. It is from her music master, saying he is waiting for his gloves, and when Georgette refuses to show it to Valmar, he accuses her of having a lover. Georgette becomes angry and goes to leave his house. Valmar now realizes his love for his wife. Herr Ludwig, returning for his gloves, overhears him express his devotion and when Georgette enters ready to go, he understands the situation. He detains Georgette and tells Valmar that the gloves are his. Valmar asks her pardon and pleads for her to stay and not leave him. She turns to her music master. He removes her hat and leads her to Valmar's arms, who reverently kisses her.

A MODERN PORTIA (June 8).—Earl Manning, a young English business man, is called out of town. He kisses his wife and child, and departs on his trip. In the next town he is knocked down by an auto and rendered unconscious. The doctors restore him, but Manning has lost all knowledge of his identity, calling himself John White. He tramps from place to place and seeks for work. He at last secures a job as stoker on a ship bound for America. His wife and little daughter, May, wait in vain for his return. Finally believing that he is dead, they sell out the household effects, sail for America to open a boarding house. A few

Genuine Parts or "Dupes"

Do you know what is being used to repair your MOTIOGRAPH—Genuine parts or "Dupes"?

A genuine part is made by the manufacturer of your machine with care as regards quality and fit, and every genuine MOTIOGRAPH part is interchangeable with the part on your particular Model—

A "duped" part is of the cheap "thrown together" variety made of cheap material by cheap workmen and made to sell cheap, without regard to fit or service.

It is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, to see that only genuine long wearing quality parts are used in your repair work.

We warn you but cannot force you to protect yourself—but if your dealer cannot supply genuine MOTIOGRAPH parts send direct to us.

years later May studies for the bar and becomes a lawyer. Warren Bradley, a young doctor, falls in love with her. Manning (John White) later takes a job as stevedore at the docks in the city where his family live. He has become gray and is marked with a bad scar, the result of the auto accident. One day in an altercation with another stevedore he knocks the fellow off the wharf. The man is rendered unconscious, taken to the hospital, and Manning is arrested. May, witnessing the preliminary hearing, offers to defend him at the trial. She goes home and tells her mother and Doctor Bradley of the case and urge them to be present at the trial. The prosecuting attorney works a strong case against Manning. When the poor prisoner is brought in May and her mother stare at him searchingly. They call him by name, but Manning fails to recognize them. May puts up a powerful defense and the prisoner is discharged and taken home to the wife's boarding house. The stevedore, angry at the result of the trial, follows and, for revenge, shoots at Manning. The shot hits him on the head and he falls unconscious. Doctor Bradley attends him and upon recovery the patient's memory comes back and he calls for his wife and child. The end is happiness for all.

BIOGRAPH.

TOMBOY BESSIE (June 3).—Bessie is certainly a terror and manages without much trouble to get into all sorts of mischief. She gets tired of playing alone and schemes to have Andrew, the suitor of her Aunt Cissie, play with her. Andrew would rebel, but the injunction that he must amuse the kid, Bessie, or get out, makes him consent. The stunts she puts him through make him worthy of the bestowal of Cissie's hand in marriage.

ALGY, THE WATCHMAN (June 3).—Mrs. Johnson has been forced to mortgage her farm, and there is danger of a foreclosure. Her sons, Algy and Steve, go out into the world to work for the money to lift the mortgage. Steve goes to work in the mines, while Algy goes to the village and becomes a bank watchman. He does not hold the job long, but it unexpectedly aids him in preventing the foreclosure until Steve arrives with sufficient money to pay the mortgage.

HOME FOLKS (June 6).—A stern father rules his little family by what he thinks to be the Bible's precepts, but it is simply the influence of his own narrow mind, he forgetting entirely his own youth. Hence when his boy suggests going to a barn dance, he flies into a rage and commands that the boy remain at home. The boy, however, becomes rebellious and goes, and for this act of disobedience the father drives him from the house and forces the rest of the family to swear never to mention his name again. A short time later they move to a new neighborhood, and the boy's sister meets and marries the village blacksmith. The old father has often regretted his harshness to the boy, but his stubborn nature prevents his admitting it. The sister, though, realizes his feelings and writes to her brother, who begs to come home. This almost causes trouble of another nature, for the blacksmith, who knew nothing of the brother, saw his wife in the apparent stranger's arms, and suspicious, was about to leave without asking an explanation.

A CHILD OF THE WILDERNESS (May 28).—Booze Marcy, a drunken, brutal prospector, failing to find gold in the Arizona desert, decides to turn North and head for Nevada, the so-called land of gold. His frail but patient wife and baby boy are packed into the prairie schooner and the journey is started. Booze's brutality becomes worse as the days pass, and soon his wife dies, leaving little Joe to the mercy of his drunken father. After a crude burial they resume the journey Northward. They come upon a party of renegade Indians, and Booze decides to leave the boy with them. He effects a trade and little Joe becomes the property of the tribe, while Booze goes on in his search for gold. Tonoma, an old squaw, takes a fancy to the child and befriends him.

Two years pass by. Little Joe is generally disliked by the tribe and is forced to endure many hardships. Finally he runs away. Wandering to the river bottom, he is found by Larry Tompkins, a big-hearted miner. Tompkins hears the boy's story and buys him from the tribe. Seeing old Tonoma's affection for the child, he makes another trade for the squaw, and the three start on the long trail Northward to Larry's mine.

Time passes on, Larry feels happy in his responsibility, and his hitherto rough shack takes on the air of a well cared for home. By coincidence Booze Marcy calls at the shack one day in an effort to secure Larry's mine. Larry refuses to sell his valuable possession. Marcy notices the boy and squaw and recognizes his son, little Joe.

Failing to secure the mine, Marcy secures an order from the court, which gives him possession of his child. This action almost breaks poor Larry's heart, for he has grown to love the boy. Booze again starts in his brutal abuse toward the child. Big-hearted Larry cannot stand for this and rather than leave the child to the mercy of his degenerate father, he gives Booze a quit-claim deed to his mine and takes little Joe forever unto himself.

LIFE WITH A CIRCUS (June 3).—Very few have a conception of even a part of the many things which must be seen to with the precision and regularity of clock work in connection with the business behind the scenes of a big, mammoth circus. Here we witness the animals about to be entrained for some new destination. The elephants, horses, zebras, camels, and animal wagons present a vast concourse of animated bustle and business, all controlled with the greatest skill in their disposition. Cages are hoisted on the cars with teams of horses. Sixteen camels hitched to a wagon make a brave showing. The loading of elephants is one of much interest, and the cage containing a hippo and pushed by an elephant is a scene to be remembered. The arrival of the circus trains and the business of detraining is graphically shown. The commissary arrangements show the dining-rooms, kitchen, and the crowds who watch the cooks. The pictures of the circus parade are delightful and various. Inside the circus we see the actors coming out of the tents to their dressing-rooms and then come some ring scenes. Last of all is shown the crowd coming out, when the show is over, and the inside of a side-show.

WHEN THE HEART CALLS (June 4).—The time has come to say goodbye and John Rice and his wife, with their baby, Ellen, take leave of the Leightons and their little son, Harry. Ellen's locket becomes broken and a part is given to Harry as a keepsake. The emigrants go to join the caravan, and the Leightons give them a vigorous farewell. On the Western plains Running Deer, the young son of Chief Roman Nose, gets lost. He is seen and pursued by two men of a small emigrant party. He is saved from them by John Rice, at the caravan camp. Running Deer admires Baby Rice and her locket. Roman Nose makes war on the emigrants and Running Deer saves Baby Rice, who is taken to live with the Indians. Fifteen years later Baby Rice has grown up to the beautiful White Bird. She is in love with Running Deer and he tells her the story of the locket. The Leightons, emigrants, arrive at the scene of the old massacre. Their old scout points out the place and tells them about it. Parting with Running Deer, White Bird rides out into the open country. She is seen and pursued by three Indians. Running Deer goes to her rescue after her capture. She escapes and meets Harry Leighton and the old scout. The elder Leightons arrive and Mrs. Leighton discovers White Bird's identity through the locket. It has just saved White Bird's life. She is told who she is and shown the grave of her parents. Running Deer arrives and is told the story by White Bird. Mrs. Leighton begs White Bird to go with her, but she decides to remain with Running Deer, and he later points out to her their future home.

THE MYSTERY OF ROOM 29 (June 6).—Two prospectors, Cardigan and Tiel, find a dead man. Searching the body, they find the map of an unrecorded gold mine. They decide to keep it for themselves and Cardigan puts it into his pocket. At night Tiel steals the map and slips away. Cardigan, tracing his false partner, discovers him registered at a cheap hotel, "Room 29." He secures the adjoining room. The next morning the chambermaid discovers Tiel is dead. He is seated on the window-sill, his body resting back against the casing. Two detectives, Nave and Hardcastle, investigate the murder. Indications show Tiel was shot from the outside. Nave considers a door to the next room, which they enter and find Cardigan on the bed, pretending sleep. He is questioned and goes back with them. Says he never saw the man before. Cardigan stays with the two detectives and the policeman on watch. They go to see a room across the alley and he gets his coat, puts it on, dropping an envelope in doing so, and accompanies them. The policeman picks up the old envelope and hands it to Nave on his return. It has the name of the murdered man on it and also that of Cardigan. Nave confronts him with it and Cardigan escapes and leads the officers a bewildering chase before he is captured. He confesses the murder and the ruse he employed to divert suspicion by the manufactured evidence that Hardcastle worked on.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY (June 7).—Jackson writes his wife that he will be home the next day. He arrives to find her away. He starts to change his collar and loses the button, which rolls under the bed. His wife enters and sees his feet protruding and, thinking he is a burglar, calls a policeman. He spends the night in jail. The same night the police capture a burglar who tries to get into Jackson's house. He resists capture and lands in the hospital. In the morning Jackson is released. His wife discovers her mistake and goes to the hospital to find him, and embraces the burglar. Jackson follows her and accuses her, but learns she thought it was him.

THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS—NO. 6—SCHOOL DAYS (June 7).—Hans and Fritz manage to start something when they are compelled to go to school against their wishes. A screaming, rapid-moving farce in line with their usual exploits.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 22—1912 (May 27).—Washington, D. C.—The Anthracite coal miners, the police, the boy scouts and the boys from the U. S. Hospital Ship Solace appear in First Aid to the Injured drills before the International Red Cross Conference.

Macon, Ga.—Miss Mary Scandrett, of this city, is crowned Queen of the Confederate Veterans' Reunion, and welcomes the veterans by presenting a Confederate flag to General C. Irving Walker.

St. Ives, England—The City of Cardiff is wrecked on the Cornwall coast, and the passengers are saved by the Breeches Buoy.

Henley, England—The annual Oxford and Cambridge eight-oared skull race is rowed in fast time on the Thames, Oxford winning by six lengths.

Del Rio, Texas—The ranchmen on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande are driving their cattle across the river into the United States to save them from confiscation by the Federal Army or the Revolutionists.

Principality of Monaco—During the Aviation Meet at Monaco, Renaux, in his hydroplane, carrying Pathe's Weekly camera correspondent, races and beats the Duke of Westminster's racing motor boat Ursula.

Chico, Cal.—The great Hooker Oak, the oldest and largest oak tree in the world, is the inspiration of the Annual Fiesta Arborea held in this city.

Los Angeles, Cal.—Caleb Bragg wins the five-mile auto race on the motordrome in this city in 3 minutes and 28 seconds, and Ralph de Palma breaks the world's records for ten, fifteen and twenty miles, on the same track.

THE TEXAN TWINS (June 5).—Jack and Jim are twin brothers. Jim loves a pretty girl and she loves him, but she is fond of teazing him by showing a good deal of attention to Jack. Jim finally gets the idea that Jack is going to win the girl, and goes off to a ranch to become a cowboy. Here he is maltreated and hikes for home. Jack, relying upon his remarkable resemblance to Jim, goes back to the ranch and promptly cleans it up.

THE LURE OF THE FOOTLIGHTS (June 6).—A singer is sent abroad by her husband to study. In order to maintain her in Paris, he impoverishes himself. When she returns she secures an engagement in the opera, meeting with great success, and has her head turned by the flattering attentions of representatives of society, forgetting the man whose sacrifices enabled her to be thus successful. One night a fire breaks out in the theater, in which she is rescued by her faithful husband, whose heroic act wins for him the return of his wife's old affection.

A STERN DESTINY (June 8).—An escaped convict meets a little girl who is ill treated by her foster mother. He adopts the child and ten years later we see him a successful man in the community in which he has taken up his residence, and the little girl grown up to beautiful womanhood. Just as our hero is elected Mayor of the town, his old cellmate appears upon the scene, and from that hour a relentless destiny pursues the man, whose life, since his escape from prison, has been exemplary.

THE ORLEANS COACH (June 2).—This is the story of the most remarkable case of mistaken identity and the most terrible miscarriage of justice ever written in the judicial annals of the world. Roussel, a wealthy merchant, has the misfortune to have in Gasnier, a bandit, a double; the resemblance between them being remarkable. On the 27th of May, 1795, Roussel visits his father's little inn on the road to Orleans. At 7 P. M. he returned to Paris. At 11 P. M. the same night Gasnier and three companions, Nicolet, Champion and Minot, rob the Orleans coach, carrying $375,000 for General Bonaparte's army. Later Roussel is shot by Gasnier, who thinks the would-be assassin is his son. Roussel, the merchant, is arrested, tried and convicted. His future son-in-law tries desperately to prove Roussel innocent, but is thwarted at every turn by Gasnier and Roussel is finally executed. At the moment of his execution Judge Lebas discovers the real criminal and realizes an innocent man has gone to his death.

MAX SETS THE FASHION (June 4).—Max, on his way to his wedding, loses his shoes and after trailing along in his stocking feet for several blocks finally buys a pair of brogans from a workman and arrives with his feet encased in these hobnail monstrosities. His future father-in-law promptly throws him out, with Max protesting that it's the fashion. He makes a countess, famous for her fashionable attire, his accomplice and thus persuades the irate host of the truth of his remarks and, at the wedding dance following the ceremony, everybody wears brogans.

THE ENCHANTED FIFER (June 7).—This is a fairy tale, in which the fifer with the magic wand wins a lovely princess. In order to do this it is necessary for him to pull off some wonderful magical stunts, which so amaze the father of the princess that he finally consents to their marriage.

IF YOU WERE CERTAIN

You could give your patrons 100% more comfort and satisfaction at practically no expense, WOULD YOU DO IT?

You can make seats that are now unsatisfactory as good as any in your house.

You can show a picture that can be viewed for hours with no ill effect upon the eyes.

You can make it impossible to show a distorted or dazzling picture.

You can show the brightest picture ever shown on a surface resembling a bank of new-fallen snow with less "juice" and every inch in focus.

A "Perfection Concave Screen" will do all that and no flat screen can possibly do it.

With the above results, you will need every seat in the house, and every seat will be satisfactory.

THE BREAK DOWN (June 3).—The officers and stockholders of the Mutual Construction Company were holding a serious session. Huntley Sharpe, the president, announced that a half million dollars must be raised forthwith in order that certain unfinished contracts in hand could be completed; then matters of the company would proceed smoothly. But a minority of the stockholders would not trust the president. They demanded that a receiver for the company be appointed. This demand so affected Mr. Sharpe that he suffered a nervous breakdown, fearing the collapse of the company.

His physicians decided that if he would regain his health he must go away instantly. This brought about unexpected results. The stockholders realized that Sharpe's absence from the city would bring about the very thing they desired to avert, viz., the downfall of the company, because public confidence in it would be weakened.

In this difficulty a bright inspiration occurred to the company's secretary. He met a man exactly the double of Mr. Sharpe. Swearing all to secrecy and pledging Sharpe's double likewise, the man was induced to take the place of Mr. Sharpe in the office day by day.

Meanwhile the real Mr. Sharpe went to Hot Springs, recovered his health after a short course of treatment, and while there, meeting several financial kings, was so enabled to raise the necessary money to complete the contracts and assure the continued prosperity of the Mutual Construction Company.

THE RETURN OF CAPTAIN JOHN (June 6).—When Captain Alvin Strong went to rejoin his ship, he parted from his sweetheart, Alice, with a promise to marry her at the termination of the voyage. He left a locket in her possession as a souvenir. The ship, however, was wrecked with all on board save Captain Strong, who was washed ashore on a distant part of the coast in an unconscious condition.

When he was restored to animation by the kindly fishermen of the village, he had forgotten who he was. In other words, the calamity of the shipwreck had deprived him of his memory. After he regained his physical health, he remained in the fishing village and secured a job amongst the fishermen. Meanwhile, his sweetheart, at home, had not given up hope of his return and daily frequented the shore in expectation of seeing his ship return.

As Alvin Strong progressed in his new work, he also progressed in the affections of the daughter of his benefactor, the old fisherman. In course of time he married the girl, and a baby was born to him. Still, he had no recollection of the past beyond the day when he was thrown upon the shore and was restored to life. Everything in his mind before this was a blank.

One day, in company with several of his fellow fishermen, he had to take a trip by water to the village which he had left two years before as Captain Strong. Agnes recognized him. So did her mother and many of the villagers. But he failed to recognize them. There was a scene of anguish between the gird and him, and she at last brought about his recognition of her by showing him the locket that he had given her two years ago. Instantly reason returned to him and he realized the position that he stood in. He had pledged himself to this girl, but he had married another and there was a child. Duty triumphed, however, and he returned to his wife and child, leaving Agnes in despair and disappointment.

A CASE OF DYNAMITE (June 8).—Jonathan Jay, while waiting on a customer in his little country store, catches Cy, the village bad boy, stealing apples. He punishes him with a whipping, and Cy plans revenge.

The opportunity comes when Jonathan gets a telegram calling him to the city to close up a business deal. While he is buying his ticket Cy paints the word "Dynamite" on his grip, and as the train pulls in, Jonathan hurriedly picks up the case and rushes for his car without noticing the awful word on it.

On his arrival in the city he goes to a jewelry store, where the clerk, seeing the word on the grip, offers him practically everything in the store. Jay takes all he can carry and starts for the bank. The jewelry clerk rushes for a policeman and they give chase to the unsuspecting countryman, who goes into the bank to draw out some money. Here he meets with the same experience, as the cashier also fears an explosion. Jay is now well loaded down with money and jewelry—but is soon tracked by the clerk, cashier and policeman. After many amusing experiences, he is captured and taken to jail where everything is satisfactorily explained and he is released and starts happily for his country home.

THE SHRINERS' CONVENTION IN CALIFORNIA (June 8), No. 1.—The procession was chiefly formed of a large number of floats emblematic of the States and various bodies affiliated with the Shriners. Noticeable were the Japanese floats and the Californian "Bear." All the floats were artistically decorated with real flowers and picturesquely attired figures. At night time there was a procession of illuminated floats and other vehicles as well as mammoth animals, the whole forming a veritable feast of the eye of brilliantly illuminated effects.

HAMFAT'S SUCCESS (May 30).—Anthony Ceaser Brutus Hamfat is a struggling tragedian whose one-night stand performances bring him no success. He applies vainly to K. E. Frobert, the famous manager, and returns home to find his landlady in a fury for his delayed payment. As he hurries to his room the landlady speeds for a policeman. Hamfat in extreme despair pulls on an old rube costume and makes a hasty exit in disguise. Two swindlers believe this to be a splendid chance and they invite the "old farmer" to dine with them in a gay Broadway cafe. Hamfat accepts. He does not neglect exhibiting a roll of stage money which he found in the costume. The swindlers are greatly pleased with themselves. At length they propose selling a third interest in an imaginary mine and Hamfat agrees. He is the real gainer, for he takes his change in real money. Hamfat hastens homeward in a taxicab to settle his accounts, buying flowers for his landlady. The swindlers are apprehended by the police and get a richly deserved punishment. It happens that Frobert, the manager, has been dining in this same restaurant. Hamfat is recognized. Just as the Thespian is giving the long-suffering landlady her money, a messenger brings an offer from Frobert to give Hamfat a good part in comic opera. He is proved an actor, after all!

CHESTNUT GROVE MYSTERY (June 2).—The aged beggar is alone in his hut. It is nightfall. Carefully closing the door and window he takes a bottle of whiskey from the fireplace and gayly empties its contents. He goes to the wall and uncovers a hiding place, and takes out a hollow piece of wood, from which he brings forth gold, jewels and banknotes, upon which he gazes lovingly. He falls asleep, and dreams he sees himself on the road again, laying in wait for the unfortunate Tax Collector of Subourg. The carriage approaches. He calls and begs for help. The collector stops pitying the poor wounded man, and helps him into his carriage. Later, while making repairs on the carriage, the collector receives a heavy blow from the beggar's cane and dies. After robbing the dead collector, the beggar drags the body to an adjacent pond, near a chestnut grove. This murder still remains unsolved. Suddenly he awakes. Someone is knocking. He hides the precious piece of wood. The door opens, and in walk two gendarmes who seek shelter. The old man trembles. The gendarmes are surprised at his attitude. Being refused a drink they start a search and first find the empty whiskey bottle, and later come upon the hiding-place of the piece of wood, which they find to their great surprise, full of gold, etc., which is wrapped in a piece of newspaper telling of the mysterious murder. Understanding that they are in the presence of the escaped murderer, they handcuff him and take him away.

AMERICAN.

THE REWARD OF VALOR (May 27).—The aristocratic Ward family, including father Ward, mother Ward, pretty sister Marguerite and brother Bill, came for a short stay on their Western ranch. Charley Hicox, ranch foreman, met brother Bill and Bill liked him. He boasted loudly to Marguerite of his new found friend; so when Marguerite met Charley ,it was pretty nearly love at first sight. Charley called several times on Marguerite, much to Bill's delight, when, one day, the father in an ugly mood ordered him from the premises. This was shortly after the arrival of the Earl of Wight, beautifully attired, insignificant in the Western atmosphere, but possessing the good wishes of father and mother Ward. Marguerite didn't like him at all, but the parents were determined to add nobility to aristocracy.

Then Bill had an idea. He confided it to Charley, who promptly enthused over it, and the result was a casual stroll into the wooly section of the ranch, where father Ward and Bill were suddenly held up by bandits. Charley rushed to the rescue and the chicken-hearted bandits made haste to leave. There was excitement on the ranch when father, hatless and warm, rushed in for assistance. The Earl refused to go farther than the bunk house. Father thought of brother Bill in the clutches of those terrible marauders and clamored for help. Again Charley hurried to the rescue, receiving the congratulations of the entire family, including the mischievous Bill and the charming Marguerite. You could easily guess that father Ward felt no further fancy for the Earl of Wight. Incidentally he made no further objections to Charley visiting on the front doorstep.

REPARATION (June 4).—Bert Morton and some college companions, while on an automobile tour stops at a farmhouse for refreshments meets and falls in love with Mary, the farmer's daughter. She returns his love.

Bert receives a letter from his father stating that it is necessary for him to come home and marry Alice Martin. Bert informs Mary that he must leave for a while—keeping her ignorant of the real reason. His father persuades him to marry Alice Martin, as it will be the means of saving them financially. Although Bert loves Mary and is in honor bound to marry her, his father's appeal that a marriage with Alice will save the family fortune, finally wins the boy over and he shuts his eyes to the vision of the unfortunate little country girl who is eagerly awaiting his return. When she does not hear from him, she decides to visit him.

In the meantime Bert becomes engaged to Alice Martin and the wedding day is set. Mary arrives at Bert's house and tells Bert the "truth," stating how necessary it is for him to marry her. Bert offers her money, which she spurns. Mary seeks to find consolation in death, but is saved by two workmen and is brought to the home of Bert's fiancee. Later, when Bert calls on his fiancee, he meets Mary.

Alice overhears a conversation between Mary and Bert and thus learns the truth of their relationship. The revelation is a great shock to her, as she loves Bert, but womanhood asserts itself and wins out. She explains to Bert that she knows all and obtains his promise that he will wed the unfortunate girl, who in the eyes of God is his wife. Bert confesses all to his father and receives full forgiveness as well as a welcome greeting for his wife.

A WESTERN TRIANGLE (June 8).—Jennie Forrester has been the playmate of the Harrison boys ever since she wore pinafores and pig tails. When the older brother, Louis, proposed to her, Jennie promptly refused him, as she loved the younger one, whom she had already accepted. Louis in anger denounces his brother and they come to blows. The crowd of cowboys step in and prevent what might have been a fatal quarrel.

John Hopkins, who hates Louis bitterly for an imaginary wrong, has been a witness to this quarrel and sees an opportunity for revenge without danger to himself, as he thinks. The two brothers have been left alone, after assurance by both that the quarrel would not continue. The younger one removes his belt with his gun and knife, and hangs it on his saddle horn, while he goes to the brook to get some water to wash himself with. The elder remains on a log, brooding. Hopkins sees this from a distance and when Henry has left, he takes the younger brother's knife from the belt and sneaking up behind Louis, stabs him in the back. Not satisfied with his fiendish act, he robs the body, then rushes away. The cowboys discover the body with Henry's knife sticking in his back and remembering the quarrel, they conclude that Henry is guilty. Western law is brought into

Jennie in the meantime has ridden at breakneck speed for assistance to the authorities. She is held up by Hopkins, who shows her a purse of money, which she recognizes as having belonged to the murdered man. By a clever ruse she unarms him and compels him to ride with "hands up" to the scene of execution in the nick of time to save her lover from death and the cowboys from committing a crime.

BEAUTIFUL PALO DURO (June 8).—A 250 foot scenic picture of one of the Garden spots of the New World. The Palo Duro Canyon is situated 15 miles from Amarillo, Texas, and has been called by Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt "one of the most beautiful spots in the United States." It was Mr. Roosevelt who proposed making this the New National Park. It contains a national amphitheater over 2,000 feet high, besides many beautiful caves, waterfalls and over 50 miles of canyons whose rugged beauty cannot be surpassed.

RELIANCE.

CURFEW SHALL NOT RING TONIGHT (May 29).—The story of "Curfew" tells of a soldier who deserted his post during wartime to keep a tryst with his sweetheart. Having left his post of duty, he was considered to be a deserter and was court-martialed forthwith. The soldier was condemned to die. His sweetheart endeavored to intercede for him with the commanding officer, but the commander was firm and austere. To set the soldier free would have been a bad example; therefore, he was condemned to die at the ringing of the curfew bell. Having exhausted all means of securing a pardon for her lover, the maiden resorted to a last desperate chance, which, though seemingly futile, was a chance. She climbed to the belfry of the tower where the curfew bell hung, and there by hanging upon its huge clapper prevented it from sounding when the old deaf bell-ringer came to ring the parting day. The bell-ringer had officially rung the bell and yet it had not sounded. Therefore the young soldier waiting to be shot was legally dead, although he still lived, when the old sexton had finished his work.

HIS MOTHER'S SON (June 1).—This picture tells how a boy is cared for all his life by his mother, when he is well and when he is ill. She comforts all the aches and pains of his boyhood and never becomes weary. The boy in this story returns from college a vastly superior young man who rather disappoints his parents with his newly acquired ways. He becomes engaged to a sweet young girl. Having written some poems he becomes quite a lion at all the social affairs he attends. While attending one of these affairs he meets a beautiful woman. He resolves to win her, and to this end he neglects his little fiancee shamefully. The beauty notices this and decides to teach him a lesson. He visits the beauty one day and shows his infatuation for her. The little sweetheart is in another room and the beauty calls her out and exposes the boy to the girl who loves him. He sees the girl and pleads with her to forgive him. She will not and he is ordered from the house. He returns home and his mother, seeing that he is worried, tries to comfort him, but he pushes her away. Later he tells her the trouble and she goes to the home of the little sweetheart and pleads with her to forgive her son. And the girl does so.

SOLAX.

A MESSAGE FROM BEYOND (May 29).—Charles Kingley's parents gave him everything they had when he left his home to start business in a large city. Charles, like other country boys, by undivided effort and persistent application, made his way to the top. He married a woman of high social position and has children, a son and a daughter. The daughter inherits her mother's snobbish characteristics, but the son is a democrat.

Kingley's mother, a good, old, homely lady, not having seen her son for a number of years, decides to surprise him with a visit. She arrives just when the family is making elaborate preparations to receive the governor. Naturally, the snobbish mother and daughter make the old lady's welcome an unpleasant one. They don't know what to do with her until something occurs in the kitchen. Young Mrs. Kingsley then has her mother-in-law attend to the preparation of the dinner. The old lady is only too happy to be of service and joyfully undertakes the work of the cook.

When Kingsley, Jr., however, comes home and learns that his grandmother is doing the drudgework he goes down there and sticks by her side, and in his boiled shirt and dress suit, assists her at her labors. He appoints himself her entertainer and does nobly.

The old lady, not long afterwards, dies and leaves young Kingsley her large painted portrait. Soon after when Kingsley is in difficulties, he imagines he sees the spirit of his old grandmother and she seems to point to the portrait of herself. Several times this occurs and in order to satisfy her spirit, he goes to the portrait, takes the picture out of the frame, and to his delight, finds an envelope containing a good deal of money.

JUST A BOY (May 31).—Mrs. Armstrong, having lost her child, is inconsolably unhappy. She passes a rather aimless existence. Even her devoted husband, who pays her constant attention, cannot take her out of that phlegmatic mood. One day she comes upon a policeman in the act of arresting a street urchin—a waif—a kid, who delights in street sports—such as dice-throwing, leap frog and banana-swiping from the "Ginny's" fruit stand. He is a wild boy—born and bred to the streets.

The boy loves dirt and delights in mud. She rescues the waif from the arms of the law and tries to bring him up as she would have brought up her little boy—had he lived. She tries to make the boy comfortable and happy and she almost succeeds—but the boy meets on the street some of his former associates and they revile him with jeers and call him "Sissy," and mock at his fine clothes.

The boy goes back home—to his fine room. He is thoughtful and morose. He has not been comfortable in tight shoes and clean linen. He longed for his rags and his old pals of the corners and the docks. With an air of determination he decides to go back to his former life—that care-free existence of the streets. He answers the call of the wild. He is just a boy.

THE OLD VIOLIN (June 5).—An old violin maker, living in a small town, spends his time perfecting instruments. Like other men engaged in kindred artistic occupations, he is absorbed in his work and forgets about worldly necessities until want—implacable and inexorable—throws her shadows across his threshold. While the old violin-maker goes out to seek financial assistance from his friend the bookseller, a young violinist comes to his home and leaves a Stradivarius worth $10,000 to be repaired. The young musician came to have his violin repaired, but soon he found that his heart strings also needed repairing—for he fell in love with the violin maker's daughter.

Although the violin maker gets temporary relief from his friend, the bookseller, a crabbed and crafty creditor later makes his life miserable. This creditor takes some of the instruments in part payment of his notes. The old musician is now left in narrow straits. In desperation he decides to substitute one of his own violins for the $10,000 Stradivarius. "Surely, that young violinist will not know the difference!" After a pathetic scene in which the violinist struggles with his conscience, his daughter enters and from his peculiar actions she guesses his frame of mind. There is a very dramatic scene between father and daughter. In the meanwhile, the young violinist enters and he saves the situation and makes harmony out of impending discord.

THE DOG-GONE QUESTION (June 7).—Dr. Nearsighted gives Billy the boot. Billy is the bane of the old Doctor's existence. The old man, being nearsighted, likes dogs because they are such dependable creatures. Billy hates dogs because they usually make a meal of the seat of his trousers; so whenever opportunity offered, Billy used to poison the old Doctor's dog. Whenever the Doctor found Billy around, making love to his daughter, the Doctor went after him with a shotgun. After Billy had poisoned his last dog, the nearsighted Doctor advertises for a live one to replace the dead one.

Two tramps, anxious to make some coin, read the ad and immediately concoct a scheme. They steal a dog-skin from a costumer and impose upon Dr. Nearsighted. In the meanwhile, Billy gets busy and poisons the food and water for the new dog. He goes to the kennel and there meets his sweetheart and tells her that he has poisoned the dog's water. The fraud, masquerading in a dog's skin, having licked up the supposedly poisoned water, overhears the conversation and supposing that he has been poisoned, almost gets a fit from fright. This complicates the situation and makes the finish ludicrous.

BILLY BOY (June 7).—Miss Eva Black, a negro washerwoman, wants to be rather fashionable and so has cards printed. She makes a call on one of her "clients" and the "client" writes on her card, "Call at 8 P. M." and gives the address.

Billy Boy is a street corner Johnny. He stands around and flirts with the "swell dames" that pass. Miss Eva Black passes and drops her "call" card. A swell girl passes and, seeing the card, picks it up. Billy spies her from the distance and, of course, follows her. She reads Miss Black's card and then drops it. Billy is on the jump and picks up the card and reads, "Miss Eva Black. Call at 8 P. M." and the address.

Billy decides it's the opportunity of a lifetime. After sending Miss Black flowers and candy, Billy primps up and calls on the waiting Miss Black. When the negress confronts him, Billy makes one dive through the window and is gone for evermore.

NESTOR.

THE FOREIGN SPY (May 27).—"After serving an eight-year sentence, Ex-Captain Carter, formerly of the Third Engineers, has been released from the military prison. Carter was convicted of treason, after losing some important plans of the coast defense. It was supposed that the papers had been secured from him by a woman in the employ of a foreign government. She was known in diplomatic circles as "Celeste."

The above article appearing in a daily newspaper is the keynote of the story. Carter, during the long weary years of his incarceration, has thought only of vengeance! The woman whose subtle power and perfidy had blinded him with passion, secured his confidence and betrayed his honor and his manhood is now the one haunting theme. He sets out to search for the object of his vengeance and discovers the siren upon the eve of a similar work. Celeste has an appointment with one Baron Von Stein, to whom she is to deliver plans of some of the country's coast defenses. She goes from the house to secure her victim, leaving a letter for the baron, giving the man servant, who is a party to the intrigue, full instructions. Upon the departure of the spy, the avenger, Carter, enters her apartment from the garden window. He discovers the letter, which reads:

"Dear Baron—Conceal yourself upon my return. I shall have with me Lieutenant Howe, who has the new coast defense plans upon his person. Trust me to obtain them. Celeste."

He replaces the letter and hides behind the portieres as the Baron enters. The servant and accomplice, following instructions, presents the letter and serves the Baron with cigarettes and wine. Celeste's carriage is heard without and the Baron is about to conceal himself when the avenger comes forth and, at the pistol's point, compels him to submit to being bound. He is then forced behind the same portieres.

Celeste and the lieutenant enter. He is a manly young chap and seems to be under the spell of the woman's wiles. Wine and cigarettes are served. Celeste, in coquettish mood, endeavors to draw from him information regarding his country's defenses, etc. He, in a spirit of bewildered confidence, displays the plans he bears. She fails, however, to obtain them. Glancing at the portieres, where the Baron stands revealed to her view, held there by Carter's pistol at his back, she interprets his glance to propose coffee to the young officer. It is brought. Stealthily and unseen, from the folds of her dress the woman takes a vial containing a drug, which she puts in the young man's cup. Celeste, with a winning grace, hands him the cup, cajoling and coquetting the while. The lieutenant raises the drugged cup to his lips, but he issaved by the firm hand of the avenger. The woman is horrified. Carter hands Howe the newspaper article, saying: "I am that man!" The officer, realizing the danger so narrowly averted and well nigh panic-stricken with fear and rage, would commit violence upon the arch-betrayer, but Carter bids him depart, claiming her for his own vengeance. The young man, breathing a prayer of gratitude, departs. In the midst of the denunciation which follows, the Baron emerges from hiding. He is unbound and, being warned, is ordered by Carter to go. Left alone with the victim of her former plots, the woman realizes her pending doom and becomes terror-stricken. Securing the pistol placed by him at hand she turns it upon herself, while he gazes coldly on, the relentless executioner.

THE SCALAWAG (May 29).—Anne is rocking the baby as Lem enters with a letter from his wife's father. As Anne opens it, Lem sees two five-dollar bills and demands the letter. Reluctantly, Anne obeys and Lem takes one bill and hands her the letter, which reads: "Dear Daughter—There is just one thing for you to do: give up that scalawag husband of yours. Am sending you ten dollars to tide you over. I have bought a ranch in another state and I am coming Wednesday to take you with me. Be ready. Your loving Father."

When Wednesday morning arrived, Anne was ready to go. Lem had been shiftless, but he still loved his wife and baby, so when he found that she was going back with her father, he decided to take the baby and slip away. This, however, was prevented by the old man's appearance in the doorway, and his wife and little one were soon on their way to their new home.

Five years passed. The baby had grown to be a mischievous tot of six, with a great fondness for horses. Lem had gone from bad to worse through evil associates. Upon this particular morning, the foreman had just placed the money he was to deposit for little Annie's grandfather in the buckboard, when he discovered he had forgotten his bankbook and hurried into the house for it. Instantly, seeing a chance for a ride and to tease the foreman, the child climbed into the buckboard and started the horse off at a good trot, and before the foreman had returned had already passed out of sight.

Lem and his partner, Luke, who had but that day arrived in that part of the country, saw the child approaching with lines dragging. Handing her the lines, Lem asked the little one where she was going. For a reply the child held up the satchel of money, then declared she was going to the bank. The two men were in the buckboard in short order, but instead of sending the child back, as Lem wished, Luke insisted that she might tell on them, and so she sat happily between the partners. As they drove rapidly along the road, a neighbor recognized the child and rig and hastened away to the ranch to tell them what he had seen. The foreman and the boys, Anne and her father, had in the meanwhile missed both the little one and the buckboard, so that when the neighbor arrived, they set out in hot pursuit.

Believing they were followed, Luke stopped the horse at the foot of a mountain and, snatching the satchel of money as Lem alighted, he raised his whip to send the horse on with the child. Lem, however, was too quick for him, and lifted her in his arms just as the horse dashed away. Up the mountain the men ran, but when they reached the top, Luke again insisted upon being rid of the child. He would throw her down to the ledge below. A quarrel followed, in which Lem was wounded and then forced over the cliff by Luke, the child in the meanwhile running away. As Luke turned to catch her, he saw the posse in pursuit and fled down the other side of the mountain. Little Annie returned and, looking over at the half-unconscious Lem, she managed to half climb, half roll, to him, but in so doing, badly injured her ankle, so Lem was forced to either carry her or leave her alone. Staggering along with the child, he reached the grandfather and his men just as they captured Luke with the money. Lem had been wounded too severely to recover and had but placed the child in the old man's arms, to learn that it was his own little daughter, when he passed away.

THE SHERIFF OUTWITTED (June 1).—Bob Short, having shot a man in self defense, is making a quick getaway from the scene of the fight. Seeing the sheriff coming along the road, he hides in the bushes until he passes, but the sheriff has observed him, however. After the sheriff has disappeared from view, Bob hastens to the home of his sweetheart, Bess Dennison, and tells her that he is going to leave the country. Bess tells him to go up to the deserted house on the hilltop and she will bring him food.

On his journey to town, the sheriff's thoughts are far from being pleasant, as he had asked Bob's sweetheart to go to a dance with him and she had refused, telling him that she loved Bob. On his entrance in town, he is immediately informed of the shooting and recalls meeting Bob on the road, and immediately starts out in pursuit of Bob, with two deputies to aid him in the search. Sending his men in different directions, the sheriff goes to the home of Bess. While he questions her, one of his men hurriedly appears and informs him that he has found empty shells outside the deserted shack on the hill. The sheriff vainly attempts to shut him up, but Bess has overheard and as the sheriff and his men ride away, Bess mounts her horse and takes a back trail to the house on the hill. In the meantime, Bob has observed the lone deputy and, fearing discovery, hides in the rear of the shack. When Bess appears there is no sign of Bob and she leaves a note for him, telling him to make good his escape, as the sheriff has discovered his hiding-place. When the deputy has disappeared from view, Bob returns and reads the note. Observing the approach of the sheriff and his men, Bob mounts his horse and rides over hill and dale, with the sheriff and his men in close pursuit. They are gaining on him, when Bob throws himself off his horse and fires at the trio, wounding one of the deputies. The sheriff orders the other one to take him home, intending to follow Bob alone. Bob has run down the canyon to Bess's home and finds her alone. Seeing the sheriff coming, Bob hides behind the door, and as the sheriff enters the room, he is ordered to throw up his hands. Binding him to a chair, Bess and Bob leave the ranch house, after writing a note to Bess's mother saying they are going to be married and are leaving the country. When the old folks return, they free the sheriff, but he is powerless, as Bob has taken possession of his horse. Bob and Bess hasten to a minister and we leave them starting out for a new land, with Bess bidding her dear mountains goodbye.

LUX.

THE APACHE BALL (May 31).—A clever skit on a high society craze is worked off in this highly amusing comedy. The Marquis of Faison gives a ball. He invites all his friends, but stipulates that they shall attend disguised as Apaches. All the guests thoroughly enter into the spirit of the thing and turn up looking the roughest crew that ever gathered together in a ducal mansion. Two real Apaches turn this to good account, and thus make a good haul to the chagrin of their imitators.

ARABELLA WORKS TOO HARD (May 31).—Mary Jane was too slow, so Mrs. Jones promptly gave her the sack. Arabella was the next household treasure, she was too quick. She executed all her household duties at express speed and this caused no end of disasters in the Maison de Jones. Many testimonials of Arabella's energy are displayed. This chapter of accidents must have caused sorrow in the bosom of the worthy Mrs. Jones, but its effect will be just the reverse upon amused audiences.

POWERS

BABIES THREE (June 5).—A momentous happening has occurred at the home of John Briggs, a traveling man, who is on the road at the time Mrs. Briggs is the proud mother of a lusty infant. Little Dorothy, aged nine, is in a quandary and appeals to the nurse for enlightenment, but is told to run away and play. The nurse turns her over to the maid, but that sedate young woman is not communicative. Dorothy is persistent and is finally allowed to accompany the maid to the railroad station, where a telegram is sent to Briggs, informing him that he is the father of a baby. It is all pretty clear to Dorothy and she wanders about the grounds only to discover that a mother cat has two beautiful young kittens. Dorothy has an inspiration. She goes to the station and coaxes an employee to send a telegram to her papa, the import of which is that two additional babies have arrived. Briggs receives the first telegram at his hotel in a distant town and is overjoyed. He proudly shows the wire to his brother knights of the road and receives their congratulations. He prepares to hasten home and is about to leave the hostelry when the second telegram comes and he deduces that he is the father of triplets, and his ardor is somewhat cooled. He is forced to show the message to his companions and is guyed unmercifully. Arriving at home he approaches the chamber of his wife with misgivings. Entering he is shown the child in its cradle and mustering up courage he inquires about the other two. The nurse is mystified and denies all knowledge of any other babies. Dorothy makes her appearance with the two baby kittens and the matter is explained to his relief and satisfaction.

THERE'S MANY A SLIP (June 5).—A comedy in which three lovers figure and their efforts to win the girl furnishes the vehicle for many laughable situations. After confusing incidents the right young man, by his ready wit, circumvents his rivals, and bears the young woman off in triumph, while his rivals incur the displeasure of the father and mother and retreat ingloriously.

HATS AND HAPPINESS (June 8).—Mrs. Van Osman, who wishes to preserve her social standing, schemes to marry her daughter to a rich husband and is ever on the alert for a catch. Valeria, the daughter, although attractive, has no other charms to commend her. Violet, a poor relative, is summoned to the hotel to act as maid and proves to be a sweet and lovable young woman. Hugh Dalton, wealthy, and in every way eligible, appears on the scene, and Mrs. Van Osman marks him for her own—or her daughter's—which amounts to the same thing. The women haunt his footsteps and keep Violet in the background.

Anna Haskins, a young cripple, lives near the hotel with her father. The doctor calls and tells her it will be necessary to undergo a delicate operation to regain her strength. Anna is poor, but sets about to provide the necessary funds. Being deft of fingers and ingenius, she fashions hats for sale and displays them before her cottage. Violet passes the cottage, sees the hats and listens to the story of Anna. She sympathizes with the unfortunate girl and importunes Hugh to visit the Haskins' home. He goes accompanied by Valeria and Violet. He purchases one of the hats, but Valeria is not interested and will not wear it, having no interest in the girl. It is offered to Violet and she is delighted and wears the headgear. The contrast in the characters of the two women is so marked that Hugh proposes to Violet and is accepted. Hugh and Violet are ignored by Valeria and her mother, but Hugh retaliates by purchasing the stock of hats and sending them to the woman by a Count, who gets in bad by his gallantry.

THANHOUSER.

DOTTIE'S NEW DOLL (June 4).—Dottie was very proud of her great big beautiful doll, but even the best of dolls are like plungers in Wall Street—sometimes they are in danger of getting broke. And that was what happened to "Beautiful Bess" and it nearly broke her mother's tiny heart.

The accident happened while Dottie and her nurse were in the park. Nurse had gone away for a moment with another nurse, and Dottie was all alone with the wreck of her child. There was no one to comfort her, and she wept bitterly.

Suddenly she noticed another go cart near her, and saw that it contained a beautiful doll, and one that was not broken. It had real hair, and could gurgle, and kicked about in a funny way that was most delightful, in fact a much more desirable playfellow than "Beatiful Bess."

So being a child who always took what she wanted when she wanted, Dottie threw "Beautiful Bess" into the shrubbery, and put the new doll into her buggy, carefully covering her up so that nurse would not notice the substitution. Gladly she welcomed the return of her nurse, and gleefully she went home, for she wanted to be alone with her new doll.

Sitting alone at supper in her nursery, it suddenly struck her that perhaps "new dollie" might be able to eat, for she seemed so accomplished. She started her in on cocoa, and managed to spill it all over them both. Dismayed she rushed from her bedroom where the new doll was, to the nursery, where nurse returned in time to see her, showed anger at her condition, removed her apron, and put it in the soiled clothes basket.

Dottie was a kind mistress, and she realized that if she needed clean clothes, "New Dollie" was in the same condition. So she took advantage of being unwatched to try to remove new dollie's clothes, failed and finally dumped Dollie and all into the basket. It struck her that immediate sanitary measures were needed (although she did not use those exact words) so she promptly dragged the basket off, knowing where the laundry was, as she had been there with her nurse.

She arrived just in time to save a poor Chinaman from being dragged away to a cell. He was an honest, hard working Chinaman (there are many of them, by the way) but his partner was a thief and had been sentenced for stealing a watch, and the judge who presided had reason to fear that the criminal's Tong was after him. So when the judge's baby mysteriously disappeared, and the good Chinaman was seen in the neighborhood at the time, he naturally was suspected. They were just preparing to work all the police degrees in full form on the unhappy Wu when Dottie arrived with her dirty doll that needed to be washed.

The judge and his wife took the new doll away from Dottie, for it was their baby, and Dottie returned home disconsolate. The grateful Chinaman cheered her up, however, by promising to get her a doll with a pigtail from the Flowery Kingdom. All the same she regrets the animated toy that she had for a short time, so short, in fact, that it did not have the opportunity to be troublesome.

HER SECRET (June 7).—The husband was stern, solemn and never could understand why any one should laugh. The wife didn't have much sense, perhaps, but she was full of life and laughter. Why they should have married was a mystery; that there should have come a matrimonial shipwreck was hardly a surprise.

A simple-minded old music master was their daughter's instructor. He deeply admired the wife, and once when the husband had been especially ill natured, and the music master found her in tears, he told her of his devotion. The husband surprised them and ordered the wife from the house. Calling their daughter, who was only fifteen, he explained that the mother, because of her sins, was going out of their life forever. The girl, however, refused to accept the verdict, and cheerfully abandoned a life of luxury to follow the mother who had always fondly cared for and loved her.

In due time a divorce was granted and the wife married the music master. They were poor, but happy, and the woman never regretted the choice she had made. On her death bed she called her loyal daughter to her and confided to her the care of her baby son, the child of her second marriage, making the girl promise to care for him always.

The first husband heard of his wife's death, and his thoughts turned to his child. He wrote to her, offering to provide a home of luxury on condition that she would cast out of her life the man and the child he hated. Her first impulse was to refuse, but the music master induced her to accept, and she realized that she would be able to provide the funds that would give "baby brother" the comforts that he needed.

The father was proud of his handsome daughter, and decided to provide her with a wealthy husband. The man he selected did not appeal to her, but when threatened with poverty, she consented, not for her own sake, but because of the sacred charge confided to her at her mother's deathbed.

On the night of the marriage, the girl received word that her brother had been fatally injured by a fall from a window. In her bridal gown, she ran from the house, forgetting everything and everybody in her anxiety to reach the child.

The bridegroom noticed her agitation and her hasty flight, and placing the worst possible construction on it, followed her to the poor tenement. There he listened and learned enough to satisfy him that his suspicions were unfounded, and to prove that the girl of his choice was a noble, self-sacrificing woman.

Tenderly he went to her and told her that he knew her secret, and that there was no reason why it should be hidden from him. "Your people are my people," he added, as he extended a hand of bortherly love to the child, then turning enfolded his bride in his arms.

And the girl whose life had been one of self-sacrifice, could see that she was entering upon a future of happiness and love.

GAUMONT.

THE MIDNIGHT WEDDING (June 2).—The big industrial manufacturer, J. H. Duncan, officer of the Legion of Honor and director of Duncan & Co., manufacturers of electric supplies, is very much attached to his daughter, young and pretty Suzanne. Although Miss Duncan is a spoiled child, she possesses grace and charm of a nature that claims her father's right-hand bower, Peter Morrison, as victim.

Young Peter is desperately in love with Suzanne, but his affections are not returned to the fullest extent. At last he proposes. In doing this, Peter receives a stunning blow, for he finds that Suzanne has trifled with his affections and cannot possibly consent to be his wife. The affair so upsets Peter that he decides to leave his employer, and notifies him accordingly. However, Mr. Duncan cannot look forward to the same success in business without the assistance of young Morrison, and so persuades him to throw off the sadness of his misfortune and remain in his employ, at the same time assuring him that he soon would rise to the most important position in the establishment. The young engineer, touched by the kind words of the director, decides to remain, but the refusal of Suzanne bears greviously upon his heart.

After a period of six months, Peter comes home one evening to find the announcement of Suzanne's engagement to a titled nobleman on the table in his room. From this time on Peter was inconsolable and could think nothing but of the coming marriage of Suzanne to the Count at the Hotel Neville, which was to take place at midnight on the 27th of December. On the night of the 27th he came home, arranged his dress for the wedding, inasmuch as he was an invited guest, placed several suspicious packages in his pockets and prepared to depart for the hotel. Before leaving, however, he wrote a note to his mother, advising that he was now bidding her "good-bye" forever.

At the hotel, Peter found Mr. Duncan making most active preparations for the final moment of the marriage. In revenge he pulled out two sticks of dynamite from his pockets, and placed them in the work of the clock on the top of his dresser. The dynamite was so inserted as to go off by contact with the electric circuit at the very hour of midnight, when the wedding festivities were in full blast. It was thus he prepared his revenge, and even if he himself could not marry the girl of his choice he would at least prevent the Count from claiming the one he loved.

In the meantime his mother had discovered the note on the table. She hurried to the hotel and arrived just ten minutes of twelve in an attempt to find her frenzied son. No one knew of his presence, however, inasmuch as he had concealed himself on the balcony, overlooking the reception room. Five minutes before the fatal hour, Peter recognized his mother and, realizing the gravity of the situation which would also include the death of his own dear parent, he made one mad rush to the engine room and bade the electricians cut off the current and give him time to remove the dynamite from the works of the clock. In the reception-room things were progressing gloriously. Suddenly that room was thrown into darkness. Terror seized every heart, and Mr. Duncan tried to explain the strange situation. Peter rushed upstairs at this point and gave a hurried explanation that he had accidentally caused a short circuit and that in a few minutes the hotel would be entirely lit up again. Mother and son reconize each other and embrace—only he and she knowing the secret.

THE VIRTUOUS HORSE (June 6).—Mr. Foot is terribly sick. The doctor has been summoned, but there is grave fear felt that he never will reach him in time. Fate has decreed otherwise and the doctor makes his appearance, much to the relief of his prostrated patient. The physician diagnoses his illness as an extreme case of general anaemia and prescribes plenty of rest and nourishing food, but total abstinence from salads and absinthe. The prescription proves very distasteful to the invalid, who has not the least notion of following the doctor's advice.

Mr. Foot's horse, however, happens to read the prescription as it lays upon a table in the back yard and decides to guard his master most carefully. To this end he follows him into a restaurant and seeing that the patient is partaking of salad, rushes up to the table and gobbles all the greens before Mr. Foot can partake of them. The vigilance of the horse next follows Mr. Foot into a cafe, where he is about to sit down to a most tasteful glass of absinthe. The beast, not being able to get into the cafe, decides to notify Mrs. Foot, whereupon wife and horse return to the cafe, single out their master and before he is able to take a sip drive him home where they can guard him carefully.

SHAMROCK.

WHITE FAWN (May 28).—White Fawn, the daughter of an Indian chief, rejects an offer of marriage from Gray Eagle, an Indian warrior. The chief is angered at his daughter's determination, and strikes her. She leaves her tribe and wanders out into the woods. Tired and hungry, she staggers to a cliff, falls over, and is found by the foreman of a ranch. Drone, an enemy of the foreman, steals the foreman's money, and White Fawn interferes. Drone forces her to go with him. A chase follows. White Fawn is struck by a bullet intended for her lover, the foreman, and dies. The picture closes with the chief waiting in vain for the return of his daughter.

A PETTICOAT RANCH BOSS (May 31).—Mr. Stubbs is a henpecked husband. He is the ridicule of the cowboys, because of his determination to do things; but when Mrs. Stubbs appears he is completely stilled. Mrs. Stubbs drives to town for some groceries and finds a youth from the city, whom she commands to come to work on her ranch. Her daughter, Rose, has returned from the city school, and is quite a young lady. She, of course, falls in love with the city youth, and they plan to elope. They leave that night, but Mrs. Stubbs, ever on the alert, gets out of bed and follows them, only to be too late, for they are already joined in wedlock. She sees the two lovers spooning, her heart is touched, and she decides to let Mr. Stubbs take charge of the ranch from now on.

MAJESTIC.

THE GREAT BOGGS HAIR GROWER (June 2).—Mr. Breeze, a young man with a bald head, has tried everything in the hair tonic line without success. He has given up, resigned to life with a thatchless roof, when one day he sees a pretty girl in a drugstore window with luxuriant locks flowing about her, demonstrating "Bogg's Magic Hair Grower." Attracted by the girl more than by the remedy, Breeze goes in, chats with the girl and buys a bottle.

It does no good. Breeze, for an excuse to talk with the pretty girl, buys more. It is worthless and Breeze plans a practical joke as revenge on Boggs, the druggist, who sold him a worthless compound. Breeze buys a fine curly wig and appears at Boggs' shop, where Boggs is endeavoring to sell a number of skeptical customers. Breeze takes off his hat and Boggs nearly faints with surprise at the wonderful results of his "grower." However, he makes hay while the sun shines, and does a rushing business, while Breeze makes friends with Mamie, the pretty demonstrator.

The next day Boggs is trying to sell a particularly hard customer, Mr. Camp. There are several other bald heads in the store and when Breeze appears Bogs hails him as the greatest living proof of the excellence of his tonic. He tells his audience of the marvelous results Breeze attained and, as a climax, he removes Breeze's hat, discovering Breeze's head to be as bald as an egg. Boggs is frantic. Grump calls him a swindler. Mamie giggles, the other customers laugh and Boggs collapses, while Breeze leaves with Mamie, whose heart he has won, even though he must go hairless to the end.

HOW HE WON HER (June 2).—In the days of advanced ideas in physical culture when beautiful ladies swing Indian Clubs and take boxing lessons, it behooves mere man not to be a mollycoddle if he wishes to stand a chance in the matrimonial market.

In this photoplay a typical man about town, who has spent more time in billiard rooms and cafe's than he has in a gymnasium, falls desperately in love with a "queen of the human race" who cares nothing for a man who cannot hold his own in any kind of manly sports. It becomes necessary for the unfortunate admirer to attend a prizefight in which a famous fighter agrees to meet all comers. In order to prove his "gameness" and win the respect of the lady of his heart, he enters the ring, and after learning how his education has been neglected along a very important line, surprises all hands, including himself.

STAGE STRUCK MAMIE (June 4).—Mamie, a young small-town girl who is ambitious to outshine Lillian Russell and make Maude Adams very jealous, gets the consent of her parents to go to New York and become an actress. She meets a theatrical man who separates her from what money she has in return for lessons in acting, and although Mamie does not show that she possesses a wonderful degree of talent along the lines of her chosen profession, she has wonderful confidence in her own ability and succeeds in getting a "tryout" at a first class vaudeville theater.

Mamie's experience behind the scenes are very amusing to everybody but herself. Much to the surprise of all she makes a big hit with the audience, so fame, glory, and money, come to Mamie.

CHAMPION.

THE DERELICT (June 3).—John Storm, a young minister, is desperately in love with Marion Truesdale, one of his parishioners. Soon after their betrothal, Sir Arthur Norworth, a wealthy English aristocrat, pays desperate court to her. His wealth and position attract her, and unknown to Storm, she agrees to go to England and become Lady Norworth. So it happens that when the wedding day arrives, Marion does not appear. Storm receives a telegram from Marion stating she has sailed with Norworth.

He is shaken with grief and agony. We see him five years later in a town in the Southwest, brought to the lowest level; a human derelict. He becomes a hanger-on to a mine owner, whom he has saved from a gang of men, and puts in his time brooding and drinking. One day, Burton, the mine owner receives a letter from his sister, that Sir Arthur Norworth is dead, and she is bringing his widow out for a vacation. Burton loses the letter and Storm finds and reads it. The realization that Marion is coming is too much for him. Conflicting emotions of love and revenge stir within him.

They arrive! Burton is very solicitous and gallant, while Storm keeps out of sight. Burton does his best within the next few days to win favor with her, but she perceives his true motive and avoids him. He takes advantage of his sister's absence one night to make violent love to her, but she repulses him. He persists and insults her, threatening to speak of her compromising position, unless she marries him. He then calls in Storm, and for the first time in many years, Marion faces him. She pleads with him to save her honor, until he throws down the bible and with a sob leaves the room.

For a moment Marion is triumphant, but Burton is enraged and he seizes her. Her hand grasps a knife that Storm has left in the room, and she strikes him to the floor. Outside, Storm hears the screams, hurries in and sees the murdered man. He realizes Marion's peril. She is in hysteria, and when the servants come on the scene they find Storm kneeling over the dead body. To them Storm shields Marion by confessing to the crime. He is taken away. The closing scene shows Marion in the garb of a Sister of Charity.

A SQUAW MAN (June 5).—In the beginning we have an elopement of a rich man's son and an Indian girl. With the consequent train of events leading up and subsequent thereto, they are as follows: First in due season, a little papoose. Then the august presence of the noble Chief Dark Cloud, the wife's father, coming upon the scene spells misery for the couple. The boy, shamed and wretched by the appearance of the old chief in his incongruous garb, half savage, half civilized, quarrels and flees, deserting his squaw.

The scene now shifts to the West. After a lapse of years, the maiden and her child are back in the tribe of their ancestors. Here, too, comes the recalcitrant lover, husband and father. Driven from the East through misconduct, a fight in a Western barroom almost costs him his life. Escaping on horseback by a hairbreadth, he is subsequently found by his own child and later nursed back to life by his Indian wife.

Then comes his return Eastward. But the manner of his return is most surprising and unexpected. The cowboy chase, the fight on horseback, the fall from the back of a wildly dashing horse. All these are startling bits of realism, clever expositions of daring and deviltry. The story is most remarkable.

REX.

GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK (May 30).—The old Grandfather permitted his two sons to run the farm, but the age-old spirit of envy and selfishness were rife in their hearts. Heated disagreements and defeated plans for individual mastery developed into frank hatred and mutual hostility. Phil, the younger son, had a frail little fairy of a daughter, the pride of Grandfather's fond old heart, the guide of his wavering feet and the tender goddess of all his worshiping thoughts. The child and grandfather were playmates, two children linked together by all the dividing years, two children fooling time and foiling its relentless edict, young spring and tired winter, one unconscious of, the other forgetting the eternal approach of the grave. Phil and his sweet little wife loved the old man. Bill, the younger son, and the venomous, virulent virago that had taken his name and his love, respectively tolerated and despised him.

Once, in grave meditation, grandfather did remember the immutable law of the years and the invincible course that leads to the last narrow house, and he made a will bequeathing all his possessions to Phil. He placed it in the old clock, that he had loved as almost a human thing all his long life. And the old clock, that had struck the hour of his birth on an eternal night long ago, chimed a parting knell to that life passing out. And then the old clock stopped, never to go again.

After his death a bogus will appeared, leaving all to Bill and nothing to Phil. Sorrowfully the little family left the house, taking their few belongings and the old clock, the silent symbol of the tragic truth hushed in the silence of the tomb.

The child's tender care of grandfather's clock earned more than its own reward—for the will was found and the last scrawl of the feeble hand proclaimed the right, like the Hand of Righteousness raised from the grave to erase a living lie. When the other realized that the crushed truth had arisen, when in sad in sad wondering he faced the wandering years, homeless and aimless, his heart sobbed its pitiful repentance and his whole abject being was a trembling prayer for pardon—a prayer answered by the forgiving hearts of the others.

ASHES OF HOPE (June 2).—The plan was conceived in a spirit of venture and adventure. He was just tired enough of society and the same social functions, to run away from them. So he decided and determined to go among the very poor, live their dreary life and fight their weary strife—just for fun. It was interesting to him, because it wasn't real enough to be terrible. The grim shadow of poverty was only a mask, and the wolf lurking and loitering at the door but a stuffed specimen. The monotonous despair and the melancholy hopes were only a stagey melodrama, to him too impossible to be real. The souls of the poor were not bare enough for him to see the red stripes of the chastening rod. He could not see the bruised hearts concealed in the disguise of a brave smile, he could not feel the pang of unrequitted soul-hunger and heart-yearning. His untutored eyes could see only the surface—and Marion's heart was deep.

Deep with the stifled aspirations of a forceful spirit submerged in the slough of desperate destitution, deep with the fire and faith of human love. She was a sweet girl, a girl with a smile as earnest and honest as truth. And her eyes told you things, things passionately pure, things higher than the earth—they spoke of an acquaintance with God.

LIEUTENANT'S LAST FIGHT (June 1).—The story opens with an Indian village, the home of Big Bear, the son of the Sioux chief. The government agent, impressed with the brightness of the lad, persuades his father to permit him to be sent to a military school.

The cadets, perfectly disciplined, are shown in their trim uniforms, drilling on the parade grounds and the young savage is introduced into their midst. Ten years serve to convert the slender boy into a stalwart man, who graduates with the rank of

Zenith Mfg. Co., Cincinnati, O.
Gentlemen:—

Your sign received and well pleased with it. Think it is the best thing in the way of a program sign I have ever seen. It is only a matter of time when all the first-class vaudeville and moving picture theatres will be using a sign of this class, as I have figured I can more than save the cost of your sign in six months. The letters show up very plain and is surprising how quick one can change the wording in the entire program. In fact the entire sign can be changed while they were taking the list of acts and pictures to the printer.

Yours truly,
(Signed) FRED. COSMAN, Mgr.,

lieutenant, and is assigned to Fort Reno. He arrives in a stage coach and reports for duty to Col. Garvin.

The officers and their families are at dinner when the colonel introduces the new officer. Lieut. Big Bear is made to keenly feel the barrier of race, as his pleasant acknowledgment of the introduction is met with coolness Soft-hearted Ethel, the colonel's daughter, noting the man's mental anguish, impulsively comes forward and gives the lieutenant her hand, with a gracious word of welcome.

The old Indian chief is advised of his son's coming, and attired in all the glory of paint and feathers, so dear to the Indian heart, visits Big Bear An affecting scene takes place as the father and son meet again, and the old chief fondly caresses the gold trappings of his son's uniform, and proudly admires the shining brass buttons.

The actions of the chief are the source of much amusement to the other officers and the women of the post, who watch the pair from a window and mimic the actions of the chief. Indignant at their narrowness, Ethel runs out and asks Big Bear for an introduction to his father.

Capt. Haines has been an ardent wooer of Ethel, and he resents the friendly interest she has taken in the Indian. He is infuriated when he sees Big Bear in pleasant conversation with the girl while the lieutenant is waiting to speak to the colonel at his quarters. Haines waits for Big Bear and warns him from speaking to Ethel. The Indian resents the insult, the men engage in a terrific struggle. Haines is being badly thrashed by the powerful Indian when he draws the revolver from Big Bear's holster and attempts to shoot him. The weapon is knocked from his hand, but the shot attracts other officers who pull the contestants apart. Haines dramatically accuses Big Bear of having attempted to kill him, and points to the Indian's revolver with one cartridge exploded.

Big Bear is court-martialed and found guilty of assaulting a brother officer, and is ordered publicly disgraced and dismissed from the service. The ceremony is most impressive, as the shoulder straps and side arms of the lieutenant are torn from him, in the presence of the whole regiment.

Big Bear packs his belongings into his trunk, including his sabre and uniform, and departs. With tears in her eyes and quivering lips, Ethel alone bids the lieutenant good-bye, and as he clasps the hand of the girl and sees the sympathy and friendship in her face, his whole heart goes out to her. With the taciturnity of his race, however, he does not tberay his feelings, and with a handclasp he bids her adieu -forever.

Big Bear is given a warm welcome by the tribe, and his father and mother. His civilian's attire is noted, and when the Indians hear the story of his disgrace they are filled with rage.

The government has been negotiating with the Indians for their lands, and, a few days later, at a meeting with the colonel at the fort, the old chief denounces the pale-faces and their methods, and threatens trouble. After his departure, the colonel, knowing that a terrible Indian war is inevitable, sends a courier to Ft. Custer, apprising the commander of the situation, and telling him that the women of Ft. Reno would be sent to Ft. Custer via stage coach, under escort, for safety. The courier is shot from his horse by the Indians, who find the letter but are unable to read it.

Big Bear has been persuaded by his father to don the war paint, and to join in the fight against the whites, when the letter is brought into camp. He interprets the message and the old chief immediately determines to massacre the escort and capture the women.

Instantly Big Bear realizes the terrible danger Ethel is placed in, and, alone in his tent, he racks his brain for a scheme to save her. A vision of her soft eyes looking tenderly at him as she bade him good-bye comes to him, and he resolves to sacrifice his life, if need be, to save her from harm.

At the fort the women are placed in the coach, and, accompanied by a picked detail, start on the journey to Ft. Custer, a larger and safer structure. As the Indians leave the camp to ambush the soldiers, Big Bear, by a ruse, stays behind, and rushing into his tent, tears the Indian feathers from his head and dons his lieutenant's uniform. Buckling his sabre about him, he examines his heavy army pistols, and, leaping on a horse, starts out on his hopeless mission.

As the stage coach reaches a valley, the surrounding bushes and trees become suddenly alive with Indians, and a volley marks a trail of death among the soldiers. Lashing their horses, the troopers endeavor to escape, and a running fight ensues.

Behind a hill the last stand is made, and huddled together the little band fight for their lives. Galloping along, Big Bear comes upon the body of the company bugler, and picking up his instrument, makes his way to the crest of the hill. From this advantageous position, hidden by the bushes, he deliberately picks off the redskins as they approach close to the stage coach Cooly and calmly he makes every bullet tell Amid the terrible excitement and thunder of riflery, the crack of his guns is not noticed.

With the clothes practically shot from his back and hanging in shreds, a trooper suddenly darts through the line of Indians, down the hillside, and plunging into the river at terrific speed the horse turns a somersault. The wounded rider clings to the saddle and the noble animal gallops to the fort. A word, and the bugle call rings out and the brigade is mounted and hastening to the scene of battle.

Meantime the little band is in a desperate predicament. Big Bear has seen the escape of the soldier, and knowing that every second is golden, he puts the bugle to his lips and the musical blasts of "The Charge" cause consternation among the Indians, who think the soldiers are at hand and hurriedly retreat. They soon discover their mistake, however, and return to the attack with redoubled fury. The few minutes' respite, however, have saved the doomed people.

Creeping up from the foot of the hill an Indian works his way to the back of Big Bear. Taking deliberate aim he sends a bullet crashing into his body. Mortally wounded, the lieutenant leaps upon the Indian, but is soon despatched As the troops arrive and charge into the ranks of the Indians a thrilling scene is enacted, but the redskins are broken up and scattered, and ignominiously run for their lives, pursued by the relentless soldiers.

The last scene shows the still form of the lieutenant, in the twilight—the man who was despised by the white people with whom he had cast his lot, and who met his death at the hands of his own race—"unwept, unhonored and unsung," his heroism unknown even to the girl for whom he gave his life.

They met. A far something in the soul of the girl responded to an indefinite something in his And the greatest blessing and the greatest bane of earth melded with and became her being -a heedless, headless love.

Then he tired of the jesting imitation, of the eternal squalor and the dreary denial, and longed for the convenient comforts and luxuries of his other life. He told them he was going to work elsewhere, and the girl's heart filled with an instinctive but indistinct fear and foreboding, interpreted by a great, glistening tear.

Type was never so cold and bold and cruel as that which told her, a few weeks later, of his marriage to millions. A great sob arose from the desert of her soul to mock the lying promises of man, and her heart bowed to a sorrow as solemn as midnight, as profound as death.

GREAT NORTHERN.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT (June 1).—Harry Wilson, leaving on a hunting trip, has rented his own apartment to a wealthy American, Mr. Johnson, who has a beautiful daughter. Harry sees her and decides he will remain. He is madly in love with the pretty American girl. In order to be near her, he fills the position of a servant. For her part, the girl has found Harry to her liking. Without losing a minute, the lover, thinking his 25,000 a year is a pretty good income, asks Mr. Johnson for his daughter's hand in marriage. But the Yankee tells him that this is too little; he has 250,000 hogs in Chicago. Harry and the girl are greatly worried. Hurrah! It is announced in the papers that a disease among the hogs has killed them all. Mr. Johnson is ruined. Harry asks again. But the news is false; it was only a scheme in order to raise the value of the hogs. He is told again that 25,000 a year is nothing compared to 250,000 hogs. Harry, however, grows desperate, and taking his revolver, tells Mr. Johnson Ethel must be his wife. The American, at first somewhat surprised, becomes enthusiastic over Harry's pluck, and consents to the marriage, without noticing that the revolver was only a harmless cigar case.

MIRROROID Screens and Curtains

The World's Greatest Projection Surface

Test Any Way You Desire.
We Will Gladly Send You Our Large Free Samples.

MIRROROID

Is a pure Mercury-Foil amalgamation applied to a canvas cloth in four even coats. It contains no shellac, varnish, jellies or filling of any kind.

IT IS NOT ALUMINUM

Try our samples by pinning same to any aluminum or other screen. Note it is pure silver white, no haze, no glare or eye strain.

We made this metalized cloth for over 10 years. We know it won't tarnish. We know it won't crack, peel or lose its lustre.

It stood the test of 10 years in the bookmaking industry. If you prefer it in pale gold we can supply it.

MIRROROID

Is in use coast to coast for various purposes. For any purpose or use.

WE GUARANTEE IT

Let us send you our booklet of testimonials. Write now.

We can show you how to obtain a picture 100 per cent. brighter with one-third less current.

Carl Michelfelder

Owns a Number of Theaters in New England, in All of which He Is Using "Hallberg ECONOMIZERS." In Waterbury, Conn., He Is Using Hallberg 110-Volt D. C. ECONOMIZER, and This Is What He Says About It:

"Over a year and a half ago I installed in my Scenic Theater, Bank St., Waterbury, Conn., a Hallberg Automatic Direct Current Economizer. This has been operated continuously ever since, both afternoon and evening shows, without any interruption, saving me fully 50% on electric current bills, and I have the reputation of showing the brightest pictures in this section of country."

To meet the competition of such projection as Mr. Michelfelder has, I am to-day in receipt of order from Robt. Molzon, of Waterbury, for a large 220-Volt D. C. Economizer.

Get Busy in your own town and lead the others

BE WARNED IN TIME

The "Hallberg Economizer" saves the most, gives the best light, and is approved everywhere.

Made only by "Hallberg, the Economizer Man"

THE HALLBERG ECONOMIZERS

Are made for either alternating or direct current circuit and for changing A. C. to D. C.

READ MY GUARANTEE BELOW:

MAKING GOOD

An educational picture as well as a thrilling drama of unusual interest, showing the operations at the oil wells and the career of of a wayward son, who ordered from his home, starts for the West to "make good". After meeting with mishaps in jumping freights, he finally locates in the oil fields. He falls in love with the foreman's daughter and in spite at first of her father's objection he wins him over to give his consent to the marriage

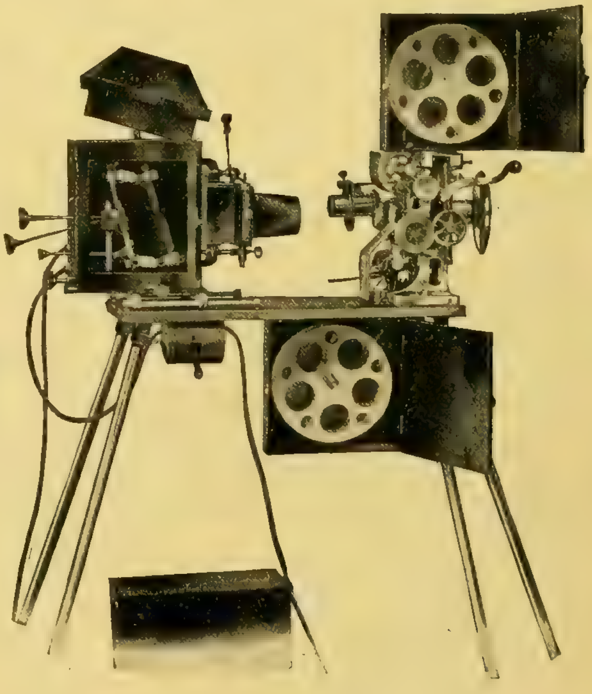
POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH WINS

The two newest and biggest moving picture shows in New York City install Power's No. 6

Paul J. Rainey's African Hunt at the Lyceum Theatre, displays a series of wonderful pictures of animal life and conditions in Africa.

The Carnegie Alaska-Siberia Expedition at the Maxine Elliott Theatre is offering a remarkable set of reels depicting life and incidents in the far North.

Both these attractions, which are being widely discussed, are showing in houses of the front rank, managed by Daniel Frohman and the Shuberts; they are both high-class, high-priced productions, charging one dollar admission. Each gives a show lasting over two hours which can be witnessed without eye strain, the pictures being absolutely steady and without flicker.



Both of these Productions are using Power's Cameragraph No. 6

WHY?

Because "POWERS" is recognized as the only moving picture machine which projects perfectly clear, steady pictures and gives absolute satisfaction.

The best films in the world can be spoiled by imperfect projection. The big producers know this and insist on having only the best machines to project their films; that is why they have installed "POWER'S."

These attractions are playing to full houses. Put in a No. 6 and you will do the same.

Let us send you Catalogue G giving full details.

RELEASED FRIDAY, JUNE 28th

Auber's Classic Opera—Exquisite Story—Spectacular Scenes and Sensational Incidents. A Complete Adaptation from the Opera. A Full Evening's Entertainment. FRA DIAVOLO is an Italian Bandit—a sort of Robin Hood.

This is a big drawing attraction. We have the following advertising matter for it: One-Sheets, Three-Sheets, Lobby Displays, Heralds, Cuts, Still Pictures and Music for both Violin and Piano.

MICKY'S PAL

Released Wednesday, June 12th

This is the film in which an expensive auto was burned for a spectacular effect. Micky comes out of prison determined to get even with society for robbing him of his liberty. Tom, his pal, is discharged from prison at the same time. Tom breaks with his pal and turns straight. Later when Tom snubs Mickey, Mickey "fixes" his old-time pal, but immediately sees his error and makes amends. The story is compelling and vibrates with heart interest.

THE GREAT DISCOVERY

Released Friday, June 14th

One of those unique comedies with comic situations that elicit laughter at every turn. The story concerns a collection of old fogy scientists who want to discover a means of making children with incubator and chemical mixtures. One of their young assistants plays a joke on them that is really funny.

Dream of a Moving Picture Director

Eddie Middleton, a director trying to rush a photoplay through, falls asleep and dreams. A pretty stenographer is in love with a clerk in the office, but the Boss is determined to possess her. He tries to kiss her, but the clerk promptly knocks him down. The villain then locks the clerk in the vault, but by superhuman strength he forces the door and escapes. The heroine then flees up the fire escape to the water tower, but the villain still pursues her. To protect her honor she brains him with an iron bar and leaps from the tower into her lover's arms. Then the Director wakes up.

Released Thursday, June 6th, 1912. Length 1058 feet.

"A Husband's Awakening"

A tale of marriage without love, but the husband falls in love with his wife. Madame de Soigny forces her son to marry Georgette Bourcet, the girl of her choice. The young Vicomte obeys and finds himself tied to a wife he does not love. He neglects her and finally leaves her. Georgette's dearest friend is the old music master, who transforms her from a demure and unsophisticated girl into a belle of society. The husband returns and falls in love with his wife, and the music master reunites them.

Released Saturday, June 8th, 1912. Length 1060 feet.

"A Modern Portia"

Back in England Earl Manning meets with an auto accident, which causes him to lose knowledge of his identity. Calling himself John White, he takes a job as stoker on board a ship bound for America. The wife and daughter, May, believing Manning to be dead, also come to America. May studies for the bar and becomes an eminent lawyer. Manning in an altercation strikes a man senseless and is arrested. May, not knowing her father, defends him and wins the case. He is then recognized and taken home and his memory is restored.

Released Monday, June 10th, 1912. Length 1055 feet.

"A Windy Day"

Teddy Blow leaving his home is conscious that a stiff wind is blowing. His hat goes off and is demolished by a wagon. He opens his umbrella and it carries him up in the air, then it turns, and Blow is dropped through a skylight into a room where an aged spinster is busy at breakfast. He escapes to the street and is pursued. The wind flattens him against a wall. The old maid carries him home and inflates him with an air pump. Presently he wakes up and discovers that an electric fan has been blowing on his face.

In Three Reels

THE FRENCH SPY

Released Through THE GENERAL FILM COMPANY

MONDAY, JUNE 17th

Tells the thrilling story and experiences of a young French girl, as a spy, among the belligerent tribes of Arabs, Moors and Turks. One of the most heroic stories of all history, literature or fiction. War scenes of countless numbers of French troops, in deeds of daring and in deadly combat with the allied hosts of Turkey on the plains of Algiers.

Read This Synopsis

General Derimond, with his wife and daughter, Mathilde, are captured by pirates. The pirate captain claims Mrs. Derimond as his property. She resists. She is forced to "walk the plank," and drowned. Mathilde is struck dumb by the sight. The General and Mathilde are sold as slaves to the Moors. Mathilde escapes and accomplishes her father's rescue.

Colonel Birnell, a French officer, marries Mathilde. He starts to the front at the head of his regiment. Disguised as a French lancer, she accompanies him. Mohammed, the Arab Chief, is captured by the French. He attempts to shoot the Colonel and is prevented by Mathilde piercing the Arab's arm with her sabre. She volunteers to go as a French spy. She reaches the enemy's fortress, disguised as a harmless Arab boy, and allowed to remain with them.

In battle, the Arabs take Colonel Birnell prisoner. He is placed in the fortress. He suffers torture rather than betray the French army. Mathilde, as previously instructed, shoots a flaming arrow high in the air. It is the signal for attack. The French forces burst into the fortress, routing the Arabs with great slaughter, saving Mathilde and her husband.

VITAGRAPH

"WHO'S TO WIN?" Monday, June 3rd

Bound to win. The modest man has all the opportunities that the forward man has. In this conquest of the heart, he beats two rivals for the hand and heart of a blushing widow, fair, fat and forty.

"THE PRAYERS OF EMANUELO" Tuesday, June 4th

Will always prevail. The prayers of a poor Mexican availeth much, bringing him, through a vision, to his loved ones far away. His faith and devotion gain the respect of his pursuers and they grant him his freedom.

"MOCKERY" Wednesday, June 5th

A masterpiece, magnificent in stage setting, acting and massive ensemble. Marshall P. Wilder's first appearance in a dramatic role. The only production in which the Court Jester has been adequately and faithfully portrayed.

"THE CYLINDER'S SECRET" Friday, June 7th

Comes out strong and clear. From the record of a dictating machine, the evidence is reproduced that frees an innocent man and condemns the guilty one. Thrilling and dramatic in the extreme.

"HALF A HERO" Saturday, June 8th

Makes a hit by accident. Eloping with his girl, he is carrying her from the house when it takes fire. He is hailed by the assembled neighbors as a hero. The girl's father gives her to him with his blessing. Some men are lucky.

"MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT"

By CHARLES DICKENS

In three reels—released June 10th—through the General Film Co.

NO writer, living or dead, affords the same wonderful opportunities for make-up, character portrayal, effectively contrasting stage groups and scenic atmosphere that are found in Dickens' masterpiece. This pictorial classic vivifies the wonderful story of the Chuzzlewits, as the pen of the master himself could not do.

The types that have made the story famous are clearly outlined and ably portrayed. Old and young Martin Chuzzlewit, sweet Mary Graham, Pecksniff the wily and his daughters Charity and Mercy, Montague Tigg the schemer, jolly Mark Tapley, the lovable Tom Pinch and his demure sister Ruth, the villainous Jonas Chuzzlewit, Mrs. Lupin of "The Blue Dragon Inn" with "roses in her dress and roses in her cheeks"—all live again before the spectator as created by their famous author.

To one who is familiar with the novel it is a film to be seen over and over again; to those who have not read the original it is a clear, effective drama showing life at its best and worst, with much comedy, not a little pathos and a very strong dramatic situation near the close.

When released in England "Martin Chuzzlewit" was acclaimed a masterpiece. It received the hearty approval of the Dickens Fellowship and of Dickens' daughter.

IF THE BEST IS NONE TOO GOOD FOR YOU, ORDER "MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT" NOW, BEFORE YOUR COMPETITOR GETS IT.

Facts and Comments

IT seems now as if there would be a pronounced increase in the production of features. While the value of features was recognized in a dim and instinctive way almost at the birth of the motion picture, their peculiar merits as a box office attraction have never been realized until such classics as "Dante's Inferno," "The Odyssey" and "Jerusalem Delivered" made a triumphant progress through the big theatres of the country. It is respectfully suggested to all, who would go into the making of features on a large scale that time is of the essence of success. A really good and meritorious feature not only requires boldness of conception or cleverness of choice, but it requires above all things plenty of time. Nor do the requirements for a successful and genuine feature stop here. Expert knowledge is required for expert work. In "The Odyssey," for instance, the stage director was by no means the most important personage. The scholar, the antiquary, the historian, the painter and the sculptor all co-operated. We could not regard any attempt at filming big subjects without this expert co-operation as other than a calamity. Historical pictures require the aid of the historian just as Biblical pictures require the aid of one who has had a thorough training in the study of the Bible. Wherever an attempt has been made to follow these lines of expert work the success has been pronounced. The Pathe "Passion Play" is still considered a classic, because of the pains that were taken in the working out of details and in the following of expert advice. To a lesser extent this holds true of "The Life of Moses."

What we want now and what the public will be quick to appreciate and patronize is an increase in the quality of features, a study of minute details, conscientious attention to history along with the most zealous and tireless striving after an high artistic standard. Feature subjects of every variety abound. Not all features of course can or need be of classic character, but even the classic field, which has given us the best films up to now has scarcely been touched. In no field is there a greater chance for a fine display of stage-craft and for superb natural settings. It would seem, however, that the specialization of feature work will bring the best and most permanent results. Some companies seem to possess certain talents and equipments for special fields. The Dickens films of one well-known film maker are an instance to the point. Other companies have evinced special aptitude for sociological work, while one or two European concerns seem to be at their best in ancient and medieval historic reproductions. By developing these special gifts and special facilities the greatest degree of perfection can best be attained and we would soon have a splendid supply of highly successful features.

THE film producer who is under the impression that the sudden acquisition of a popular player from a rival company is a short cut to success is painfully unfamiliar with the rudimentary principles of his business. An actor, no matter how gifted or clever, is, after all, nothing but a mimic and not an originator. To bring his special gifts and talents into full play and make them show to the best advantage he must be fed with good parts and directed by competent directors. Some actors and actresses possess a distinct and lovable individuality, but even they must be supplied with new ideas and with parts specially suitable for them. The star system has been the bane and folly of the theatrical world on this side of the ocean. There is small chance of the same fatuous system gaining any considerable ground in filmdom.

AN esteemed contemporary with a moving picture annex dishes out this choice bit of information to its readers:

> The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court has dismissed the appeal of the Greater New York Film Rental Company from the decision of Supreme Court Justice Bijur denying an injunction against the revocation of its license to rent films from the Motion Picture Patents Company. An appeal to the United States Supreme Court is threatened.

As a matter of fact the appeal in question was not dismissed at all, but was duly heard before the Appellate Division, which affirmed the judgment in favor of the defendants, rendered by the court below. An appeal to the United States Supreme Court from an Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court would be a decided novelty. It would indeed be a masterpiece of Pickwickian law. Our friend must have learned his law from the old fashioned melodrama, where the property in the absence of a will went to the nearest villain and the heroine committed suicide because "her marriage lines" were stolen, though the county clerk for a a small fee would gladly have given her a true copy.

NOT less than seventy per cent. of our American film producers are selling their reels in England and Continental Europe. We have in a recent article pointed out the dangers of the European film market. We called attention to the fact that a lowering of American standards to meet the coarser and less discriminating taste of Europe might easily result from a too strong desire to cater to the European market. There is another danger which may also be pointed out to our producers. We are speaking of European censorship. The latter, while exceedingly liberal in point of morality and public decency, is exceedingly rigorous in upholding what it is pleased to call the prestige and dignity of the law. To make fun of a policeman, for instance, means exclusion from the Prussian and Austrian dominions. From the beadle to the monarch, the representatives of law and order must be protected against criticism and ridicule, however good-humored. It is easy to see that such a state of affairs with its lese majeste and all the rest of medieval relics would make a good many American films impossible in certain parts of Europe. Producers who supply the markets for those parts might be tempted to live down to such a level of servility. Much of the spirit and the ginger of American comedies would thus be lost. Only recently several of our prominent manufacturers have returned scenarios, because "not suited for the English market." We have all the censorship we need right here in our own beloved country. Pictures made in this country ought to be made for the pleasure and instruction of Americans.

"Oh the Dreadful Moving Picture."

It Qualifies as a Formidable Entry in the Sea Serpent Handicap of 1912.

THE harbingers of the silly season are here. A respected citizen of Bayonne, N. J., president of a local temperance society, on returning from his work late in the afternoon was startled by a strange green creature rushing out of a mosquito pond. The monster had a long, lithe body and a most wobbly tail. It glared balefully at the respected citizen. The latter stood horrified, "rooted to the ground," as the local reporter styled it, when the monster emitted a weird and piercing noise, which so frightened the said respected citizen that he made a dash for an applejack dispensary. About the same time two ancient and trustworthy fishermen of Gloucester, N. J., raised their nets in the Delaware river and brought to view an angry fighting fish, which on examination was found to have four small feet and long but irregular teeth. It gave forth an odor, which is said to have thrown one of the fishermen into a fainting fit, quite an achievement even for a monster, when it is remembered that Gloucester fishermen have no dainty olfactories—and this is true of Gloucester, N. J., as well as of Gloucester, Mass.

"The wicked and deplorable moving picture, perverter of youth, breeder of crime," etc., is at present running a close second in the sea-serpent handicap of 1912. Mingled with the usual indiscriminate abuse are attempts to give names and dates. Quite the worst case we have seen in many years we find in The Philadelphia Record, ordinarily a respectable and well-conducted journal. The Record places the following shrieking headlines over an alleged special dispatch from Scranton, Pa.:

BOY IS TO HANG FOR PICTURE PLAY ACT

Young Bishie's Express Robbery Tragedy an Exact Reproduction from "Movies."

SLEW TRUSTING FRIEND.

Waited for Whistle at Long Curve So the Shot Would Not Be Heard.

We do not in any way blame the man who is responsible for this fearsome "head." He had to be guided by the story of the correspondent and he could do nothing less, for the story was ornate, explicit and circumstantial. There is a fine, rich old Munchausen flavor about it, which entitles it to extended notice.

> We are informed that "the unfortunate 19-year-old youth who goes to his death on the scaffold, June the 20th, next, can thank the lurid drama of the photoplay for his short lease of life. He will pay for his fondness for the moving picture theater with death. Bishie, although hardly more than a boy, has been sentenced to death for perpetrating the most carefully planned murder known to northeastern Pennsylvania, and he calmly boasts that he got his idea from the moving picture shows.
> "His practical admission of the crime was followed with a complete confession and he was placed under arrest. Later he amplified the confession and told how he got the idea for the murder from the moving picture play which depicted the killing of the messenger and robbery of a train in the far West."

If the reporter had been satisfied with these general and vague statements he would have been safe from exposure. He was not satisfied, however, and stated that at the time of the commission of the crime, November, 1911, the moving picture known as "The Great Train Robbery" was being shown in one of the moving picture theaters in Scranton. The reportorial fancy being now aflame it gave forth this remarkable gem of truth:

> Admitting his guilt, Bishie coolly pointed out the similarity between the slaying of Borger and the killing of the express messenger in "The Great Train Robbery," a film just at that time being shown in one of the moving picture theaters of this city. Investigation showed that, detail for detail, the killing of Borger and the killing of the man in the picture play were identical, except where alteration was forced by local conditions.

Now we will not speak of the circumstances of the robbery, as related in the article itself, being wholly different from the incidents in "The Great Train Robbery." How, for instance, could the murderer have learned from the moving picture, "that he must wait for the whistle at Long Curve so the shot would not be heard"? We will likewise forbear pointing out numerous other ridiculous inconsistencies in the story, for we have far better evidence to show that "The Great Train Robbery" could never have been seen by this boy in November, 1911, either at Scranton or anywhere else. From a fairly good knowledge of the film market in Philadelphia the writer can testify that the reel in question was completely out of commission in the latter part of 1909. Nor would it have been possible to procure the reel from New York or some other city, because the age and physical condition of the film forbade its going through a moving picture machine. Even ordinary wear and tear would make a film practically useless after a life of five years and "The Great Train Robbery" was a feature in those days (we state it without pride) and booked weeks and weeks ahead even when to the writer's knowledge it was doubtful whether it would survive the night.

These facts as well as the contradictions in its own article should have made it plain to the news editor that the whole yarn was ridiculous and a willful libel on the motion picture. We doubt whether even a New York "yellow" would have printed so bald and obvious a falsehood, even though from a "yellow" point of view it might be considered temptingly "good copy."

There is no remedy in law against such deliberate and willful falsification. The only hope lies in an appeal to the fairness and justice of the public and to the decent and careful portion of the press. The Moving Picture World has been voicing this appeal in a hundred tunes ever since its birth and we hope to inspire the exhibitor with the same zeal. It is the exhibitor individually or collectively who can render a service not only to himself but to all his brothers and to the industry by protesting letters to the offending editors against this sort of injustice. A letter has been sent to The Record and it is hoped that this paper will do the honorable thing and make the needed correction and apology. The case of The Record, however, is but one in a hundred, and the exhibitors must protect the good fame of the picture by taking care of bad cases of misrepresentation in the respective cities and giving them their attention. To some extent we are glad to say this is being done now. There are many exhibitors who can wield the pen in defence of the motion picture. The files of The Moving Picture World will be found useful by any who wish to write, for they are indeed a treasure house of solid information and just eulogies and appreciations of the motion picture art, its present aims and ambitions, its achievements in the past and its great hopes and unlimited possibilities of the future.

Studio Saunterings

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WITH one wing out of commission and in a state of general disability, too dully harmless to even deserve the contumely of being called "merely amiable," I strolled into the Vitagraph Studio unannounced and came upon Mr. Smith in his private office with his war-bonnet on. Exactly the thing to say or do in the presence of the head of a great business when he is in a belligerent frame of mind was not suggested to me by past experience—I usually beat it as fast as I can—so I said "how-d'ye-do" and swiftly studied the mood which led him to bring some delinquent to justice. From the point of view of an impressionist, I should say that Mr. Smith is one of those undemonstrative sort of men who are difficult to understand, even by their most intimate companions. He is kindly and agreeable enough in conversation, but aggressive and executive, thoroughly dependable, and insistent that others shall attend to the business in hand.

I stated my mission plainly. I was interested, and I thought many others would be, in learning how such an enormous business, involving primarily the art of entertaining mixed audiences numbering uncountable millions and secondarily a staggering array of other problems, mechanical, commercial, political and artistic, came into its present well-organized form of existence. Mr. Smith's response held me spellbound, though it was given without embellishments of any sort. He spoke with the unhesitating directness of a man who knew what he was talking about, and his narrative so easily comprehended the evolution of the motion-picture business from its rudimentary state that I felt like a novice in it.

We read the biography of a great man to see how he happened; his development is both suggestive and instructive—and a mother has similar, superior opportunity in watching the unfolding of character in her child, but it is allotted to few of us to see a really great commercial-artistic enterprise swiftly grow on our hands, and we naturally wonder how it all came about. This is particularly true of producing moving pictures and of a firm so representative as the Vitagraph Company. There are three experienced men in the partnership now, but those originally associated were the younger ones, Messrs. Smith and Blackton. The adventures of these two during the early days, those of the late Spanish war, would fill an entertaining book, but I doubt if such a volume will ever see light.

Messrs. Blackton and Smith rose from the ranks of entertainers largely through native ability to respond to the demands of the times. Mr. Smith found that the Edison projector then in use was so faulty that long waits were enforced at the presentations to adjust the film so that the picture could be held in alignment; that is, not cut in two on the screen. Such delays were fatal in an entertainment of any kind, and might have killed the exhibition of moving pictures had he not originated a setting device by which the operator could adjust the picture to the screen instantly upon perceiving that it was being split. To this invention is due the steadiness of the exhibition, where the audience might have had to wait five or ten minutes for the operator to make repairs.

The first studio of this wide-awake team was a comparatively small room at the top of an office building located at 140 Nassau Street, New York City. The first picture was that of a Spanish flag fluttering proudly on the breeze. There was nothing else to be seen but this hated emblem at first. Then a hand appeared. Slowly the great hand grasped the hostile banner and dragged it down and, by the same movement, caused another to run up to where it could dance on the breeze. Old Glory! Imagine the cheers in those exciting times! This intense and timely production was entitled "Tearing Down the Spanish Flag," and I suppose the band struck up "The Star-Spangled Banner."

Another patriotic effort was "The Battle of Santiago Bay," and I hope to have the pleasure of seeing this early contribution to the New Art some day, though it was the cause of a severe injury to Mr. Blackton. Photographs of the American vessels engaged were procured and pasted to wooden floats to represent the fleet, and a bay was improvised out of an oil painting, the back frame serving to hold in the water. Personal friends of producers stood at either end smoking cigarettes and sending realistic puffs of smoke along the water at intervals, while paper pellets were dropped in to indicate where Spanish shells ripped up the surface of the bay. Mr. Smith was at the picture machine, while Mr. Blackton officiated in the humble capacity of gunner, being engaged in setting off little powder flashes on the vessels with a piece of punk.

The first disaster was due to an unperceived leak in the picture frame. One of the young men engaged in puffing cigarette smoke along the surface of the water and was stooping down for this purpose with his hands under the frame had a cold chill and discovered that the waters of the bay were tricking down his sleeves. The second was a serious matter. Mr. Blackton had one hand covering the powder box when a chance spark ignited the contents. There was a blinding flash of a pound of powder set off, the interior of his hand was burned to a cinder, and the enforced contraction drew his fingers together so tightly that they had to be forced open to permit of the application of treatment. It is a matter of wonder as well as of congratulation that he completely recovered. Immediately after the accident, while his hand was swathed in bandages, Mr. Blackton informed enquiring friends that he was recovering from a wound received at the Battle of Santiago Bay.

The early trend towards photodramas of patriotism in Vitagraph work has found more recent manifestation in such grand presentations as the Battle Hymn of the Republic, a production beyond criticism other than that there is not enough of it. The limitations of space make the action so rapid that the average audience has hardly time to grasp the full significance of the piece, and there is enough in it to be extended another thousand feet with far more impressive results. This production indicated to me more clearly than any other I have seen that thrilling words can play a part in the photoplay such as would not be effective in using ordinary sub-titles. Such plays should be seen again and again to be fully appreciated, and I hope this one will take its place among those to be shown in the schools before another year has passed.

The production of larger plays will solve a great many problems now confronting those who are seriously intent on turning out the most entertaining features to be procured, whereas the little plays, flashing out for a few weeks and then vanishing forever, do not admit of seriously considering some of the most essential factors. The present moving picture show is only a pell-mell medley of good, bad and indifferent skits huddling one after the other in no apparent order or intelligence of arrangement in the programme. No lasting impression results, the evening's performance fades out of memory, and we only go again because the risks are small and the possibilities are unlimited.

A visit to the Vitagraph plant leaves no doubt as to its resources. They are ample for the production of a play that will fill an entire evening's programme. There are several studios in the main building and they can be operated by natural light alone or by artificial light alone or by the two in conjunction. This company was, in fact, the first to use electric light in taking moving pictures, the experiments being conducted at the Manhattan Theater with ordinary arc lights of enormous amperage furnished by Joe Menchen.

As a result of these experiments a contract was made to photograph the Fitzsimmons and Jeffries fight. All preparations were completed, but the cylinder head of an engine blew out at the last moment, and on this account other producers have received the credit of first using electric light in this form of photography. The factory resources of the Vitagraph Company can be imagined when it is realized that they are turning out five releases of thousand-foot reels each week, a rate of production that involves the use of a complicated and well-organized force in all departments.

The Vitagraph employs nine directors and each one of these may be operating with a company in the studios, in the yard, or in various parts of the country. At the same time, actors and actresses must be interchanged among these companies according to the type requirements of photoplays; plays themselves must be constantly provided, and the call upon the wardrobe woman and property man would shake an old-fashioned theater to its foundations. Messrs. Smith and Blackton are ready and competent to produce large plays of the highest quality.

Where are such plays to come from?

Who is to write them?

I hope that we shall have an abundance of historical plays, especially those which help to point our course in the future as a nation, and revival in the photoplay of what is worthy of survival in literature will always be of value, but the really great play must deal with what is occupying the minds of our progressive men and women at this moment. One great photoplay of undoubted genius will show that live and glowing issues, not those barely smoldering in the ashes of past achievement, are necessary to the lasting popularity of any such presentation. I do not think that this New Art was intended to be purely imitative, to merely subsist on what has been done in literature and the drama.

A great deal that is enumerated under the heading of classic was written for times long gone by, and many of such works have no bearing on present problems. They seem very tame on the screen at times and are watched with much the same silent respect that is accorded to the passing funeral of one we have but slightly known and in whom we have ceased to feel any great interest. In days gone by many problems were so completely solved for the time by the force of events that they did not intrude themselves on the daily thoughts of common people. To-day they are pressing upon us with tremendous power and so unceasingly as to give thinking men no rest. What was then only considered by the wisest is now earnestly studied by the smallest and humblest of human beings.

Perhaps photoplays of genius will come from the common people. The purest flowers as well as those which have the power of expressing what lies in the soul often burst into blossom from dark soil and in lowly places. There is no reason why a dramatic spirit should not flare out in the silent drama, when it would be long repressed by the requirements of stage performance. No dramatist has ever reached permanent success in the latter without mastery of the language including comprehension of its poetic values. Therein lies a barrier difficult to surmount by any pure flight of genius, which might go ballooning in photodrama without fear of carrying too much material ballast. The big photoplay of the future will have to be modern, progressive, and even prophetic to stir the universal pulse of humanity. It must deal with what has already become strongly established in the daily thoughts of men and women or must stimulate new ideals by intense emotional appeal.

In roaming about the yard on my own account, I could not help observing changes made since my last visit, of no great importance in their way, but showing that studio construction in general is seldom predesigned. It is largely responsive to necessities which constantly arise. Vitagraph overflow is at present poured into small structures, and in one of these I saw some men playing cards. This is the first time I have noticed any provision for those who have to wait long hours in idleness for their turn through no fault of their own, actors called long before the scene is ready for them, or whose attendance is compelled by other necessities.

Playing parts in the moving pictures is no sinecure, the work of assuming an enormous number of roles, all at short notice, is often exhausting even when physical perils are not involved, and all sorts of discomforts enter into daily experiences. Just before leaving I saw Miss Edith Storey play the part of a maiden lost in a snowstorm—a studio snowstorm—and I thought she would melt before it was all over. In the first storm scene she comes down a rugged pass through blinding whirl of snow and drops exhausted at the extreme foreground, right under the muzzle of the camera. In the second she is discovered there by a searcher who stumbles over her snow-covered body.

When all was ready for the first realistic appearance a terrific studio storm was in progress. At either side of the scenic gorge stagehands were shaking branches of wind-swept pines, two men were dropping paper snow from the rafters above, others were driving starch snow and sawdust snow across the scene with electric fans, while a veritable artist in the business was employed with an electric fan sending up a whirl of salt snow and dried leaves from the right foreground. Whoo-ee-ee-oo! One could almost hear the wintry blast though the thermometer was perspiring. Down came the poor girl with a realistic expression of agony on her face—she could scarcely breathe—and sank into the drift with an unmistakable air of relief.

In the second scene she was ruthlessly buried in the composite studio snow and had to beg for a peep hole which would allow her to get a breath or two of fresh air—all actors and actresses look alike to directors and stagehands—the villains! There she was compelled to ignominiously remain while rehearsals of tree shakers, wind producers and snow artists were in painful progress. Being a heroine and motion-picture favorite has its strenuous moments. It was, however, one of those rare occasions when a lady got enough face powder to satisfy her most ardent longings for artificial complexion aids. The finer part of the studio snow is called by cosmetic makers "poudre de ris." I know what I am talking about because I have seen it manufactured by the barrel.

The Vitagraph companies are admirably recruited in the matter of types, and I have yet to meet one of their performers who did not take pains to speak in high terms of kind treatment received. Messrs. Smith and Blackton have been more than generous in according recognition to all their players—many of the latter are suffering from an embarrassment of glory—for fame so pervasive and excessive popularity of personalities so obtrusive may cramp the photoplays until there will be little left to the imagination.

The big play will bring the really great actors to the front without curbing those of budding talent, especially when it is written and produced less for untutored minds than "to provide lively entertainment for minds that are not primitive." I believe that this big success of the future will also contain an essentially modern idea for reasons best given by a well-known poetess:

Keep out of the Past. It is lonely,
And barren and bleak to the view;
Its fires have grown cold, and its stories are old—
Turn, turn to the Present—the New:
To-day leads you up to the hilltops
That are kissed by the radiant sun,
To-day shows no tomb, life's hopes are in bloom,
And to-day holds a prize to be won.

"The Garden of Allah."

J. PARKER READ, JR., already widely known as a maker of scenic motion pictures, has added greatly to his reputation by the production of a new subject entitled "A Motor Trip to the Garden of Allah." As a picture it stands out strong in point of excellence among the several scenic subjects that are being offered at this time, possessing better photography and more interesting scenes than all the others. As an achievement on the part of the producer, Mr. Read, it represents a large investment of money and testifies to the great persistence and unequaled (among picture men) daring and diplomacy.

The Garden of Allah is a definite place, situated in the Desert of Sahara near the city of Biskra, south of Algiers. It is owned by Count Landon, who bought from the French Government the right to improve some two acres of the desert sands and there constructed a wonderful garden, said to be the most beautiful in the world. It is of this "Garden of Allah" that Robert Hitchens wrote his famous story of the same name, since dramatized by him and produced by Liebler & Co. at the New Century Theater, New York.

Camel Hauling Auto Through the Sand.

Because of the beautiful scenic effects of the stage production, Mr. Read proposed to Liebler & Co. that he be allowed to make a picture version of the play, but the price asked by the owners was prohibitive, so he decided to make a picture of the Garden itself. Journeying from Paris by automobile, Mr. Read has produced a motion picture of the trip and a most delightful production it is. Three reels of film were required to record the interesting scenes of the journey, during which there is scarcely a dull moment.

Through the co-operation of Mr. George Tyler, of the Liebler Co., Mr. Read followed the same route and used the same guides who assisted Mr. Tyler when he made the trip two years previous with his corps of assistants to secure material for the staging of the play. Many of the scenes in the picture are similar to the stage production and are beautiful to the last degree. In addition to these Mr. Read has given views of the region and the people who live there which could not have been produced in the play. There are scenes from villages along the route showing the habits and customs of the peculiar people of that country. Many native dances are shown of which the dance of the Howling Dervishes is intensely interesting and which shows the dancers thrusting daggers through their cheeks and burning themselves with fire. Other interesting ceremonial dances are the Triumph dance of the Soudanese and the dance of the Ouled Nails women.

The scenes in the Garden of Allah are extremely beautiful and show the splendor of the place to better effect than is shown in the play. Many of the characters depicted in the play are presented in the pictures, namely, the flute player and the old sand diviner.

It is impossible to describe all the beauties of this splendid picture; they must be seen to be fully appreciated, and there will be no difficulty in appreciating them because the photography is so clear and sharp as to make each object stand out in perfect detail.

Dervish Dance from "A Motor Trip to the Garden of Allah."

While mentioning the excellence of the pictures something should be said of the difficulty with which they were secured. In this region foreigners are looked upon with suspicion. Many are religiously opposed to being photographed and it was only by the exercise of rarest diplomacy and the distribution of liberal backsheesh that the more intimate pictures of native ceremonies were obtained. Mr. Read is to be complimented upon the success of his venture, for it places him among the foremost of the picture explorers.

Educationally this subject has a high value as illustrative of the habits and customs of an almost unknown people and a region but little explored. It is certain to arouse the keenest interest among the critical and discerning public. It is being offered by Mr. Read on the State right plan and a number of States have already been sold.

CASHMAN'S PERFECT IMPERSONATIONS.

Harry Cashman, the popular comedian with the Essanay Eastern stock company, received the highest compliment possible some few days ago when a letter came to the Essanay office from a lady residing in Baltimore. She said she had seen Essanay's comedy entitled "Getting a Hired Girl," released some time ago, and had recognized the "actress" playing the part of the discharged servant girl as a lady friend for whom she had been searching over seven years in all the large cities of America. We quote the following from her letter: "This is the second time I have seen the same face in your films. In the other picture she took the character of a washerwoman. She is a tall, large-featured, heavy woman and quite suits the parts of maid and washerwoman. Please be kind enough to give me the name of this party, as I have been very much worried over her disappearance." It is too bad to disappoint our good friend in Baltimore, but the truth is that Mr. Cashman is the "lady" she is worrying about, and played the part of Bridget in the above-mentioned film. Naturally, Cashman is patting himself on the back over his female impersonations that are evidently excellent enough to fool the very best of critics.

Exchange Men Meet.

Convention of Independents at Cincinnati to Apportion Territory.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

ON Sunday, May 26, at the Gibson House, Cincinnati, a meeting of Independent exchange men of the Central States, affiliated with the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., was held to fix the boundaries of exclusive territory for exchanges in these states. At this meeting the assignment of exclusive territory for all such exchanges throughout the United States was completed, as, at the Chicago meeting, boundaries had been arranged for all the Southern States and for territory east of Pittsburgh and for all states west of St. Louis. Joseph Hopp, of the Standard Film Exchange, Chicago, represented the committee of three chosen to act as arbiters in case of disagreement.

The following exchanges were represented: the four Laemmle exchanges, the Standard of Chicago and Louisville, the Anti Trust of Chicago, the Central of Indianapolis, the Toledo Film Exchange, the Victor of Cleveland, the Buckeye of Cincinnati, the Victor of Buffalo, and the Independent and Photoplay exchanges of Pittsburgh.

Mr. Hopp states that the greatest harmony prevailed in the division of territory. He also asserts that the owners of all Independent buying exchanges in the United States not financially interested in the manufacture of films, are without exception, in favor of the Universal Company's programs. "This is a fact, and not a boast," Mr. Hopp emphasized.

Mr. Hopp also explained that each exchange can operate, in its assigned territory, as many branches as may be deemed necessary to meet the requirements of the business. In cases where two or more exchanges are located in the same territory, and using Universal programs, they will work in harmony to prevent conflict in bookings.

The agreement to be signed by the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. and affiliated exchanges will include a clause providing for the retirement of films, thirty days after the signing of the contract. The retirement of films will be based on the real purchase of the corresponding month, of the previous year, by exchanges. The agreement is being prepared and will be in readiness for signatures at an early date. The elimination of junk and of junk exchanges will be zealously followed by this faction of the Independents.

P. A. Powers, David Horsley, Harry R. Raver, of the Eclair Company, and Mr. Magie, of the Solax Company, were present at the Cincinnati meeting.

UNIVERSAL RELEASES.

It is announced at the office of the Universal Company that all manufacturers affiliated with it will, commencing with the releases of June 10, ship direct to exchanges instead of through the Sales Company.

The future of the Sales Company has not been definitely decided at this writing.

IN THE FILM SUPPLY COMPANY CAMP.

Preparations for large business are going quietly forward at the offices of the Film Supply Company, No. 133 West 44th Street. The entire third floor of the building has been taken and workmen are installing the furniture and fittings. A fine exhibition room will be installed and equipped with a new projecting machine of approved pattern. All F. S. C. film will be censored at the new offices.

Regarding the policy of the F. S. C. in its relations to the exhibitors, a prominent member stated that every facility would be given exhibitors to get F. S. C. pictures. No attempt would be made to compel exchanges to take exclusive F. S. C. pictures, so that no exchange will be able to say that it cannot supply its customers with those pictures. Exhibitors who want F. S. C. pictures have but to demand them.

It is also announced that on and after June 4th all F. S. C. pictures will be shipped by the Film Supply Company from its offices at 133 West 44th Street, New York.

HAL REID LEAVES RELIANCE.

Hal Reid, the well-known actor and director, resigned from the Reliance Motion Picture Co. on May 25 after having fulfilled a successful season during which he produced a large number of meritorious plays. Among them are: Father Beauclaire, Curfew Shall Not Ring To-Night, Virginius, Votes for Women, Kain Tuck, and others. Mr. Reid has enjoyed a long career before the footlights and as an author of plays and photoplays. It is understood that Mr. Reid will enter the manufacturing business on his own account and become a producer of state right features:

JOHN BUNNY SAILS FOR ENGLAND.

That sterling comedian of world wide celebrity, Mr. John Bunny, of the Vitagraph Co., sailed for England on May 25. With Mr. Bunny were Mr. Lawrence Trimble and Mr. Arthur Ross. It is the intention of the party to take some pictures that require genuine scenes of London and other parts of England. It is understood that the principal object of the expedition will be to produce an accurate and authentic picture version of Pickwick Papers with Mr. Bunny in the role of Mr. Pickwick. It is the intention of the Vitagraph Company to make of this production a film classic. The story and character studies will not be slighted for the sake of cramming it into an arbitrary three thousand feet. It may take five thousand feet to do it right, or even six thousand, but the main object is to do it right. A full evening with Dickens, especially with Pickwick, if done right, should be one of the choicest of treats. The scenes will be taken under the direction of Mr. Trimble and Mr. Ross will do the camera work. The types for the characters will be selected in England by Mr. Bunny.

NATHAN HALE PICTURES TO BE ENJOINED.

It is stated by the promoters of the Nat Goodwin "Oliver Twist" pictures, that proceedings will be commenced at once under the copyright law to prevent the sale of the so-called "Nathan Hale" pictures in which Mr. Goodwin appeared and which are being offered by the Colonial Film Company. The grounds for action are said to be infringment of copyright owned by the estate of Clyde Fitch.

"ORLEANS COACH" RELEASE DATE.

Pathe Freres announce that the release date of the special feature, the "Orleans Coach," was erroneously advertised as June 2. The right date is advertised elsewhere in this issue of the Moving Picture World as June 3rd. Exhibitors and exchanges are requested to take notice.

NESTOR RELEASE DATES CHANGE.

Nestor gives notice that its release date for Saturday has been changed to Friday and that the release of Saturday, June 8th, has been cancelled to conform with the changed program. Also, having no orders for Friday, June 7th, nothing will be released on that date, but beginning with the following week its releases will continue regularly on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, June 10, 12 and 14.

NEW BELLOWS FALLS THEATER.

The Standard, a new motion picture theater to be erected on Canal and Rockingham streets, Bellows Falls, Vt., will be ready for business about September 1st. It will seat 900 persons and is being designed for pictures and vaudeville. The Kimball Company are the builders.

THE AUDITORIUM, MAMARONECK, N. Y.

It is seldom that one finds a theater so well managed as is the Auditorium, in Mamaroneck, N. Y., especially in a town of 7,000 inhabitants. When this theater was opened it seemed to be a loser from the start, and remained so until its present manager, Jacob Brand, assumed control a little over two years ago. Mr. Brand has been carefully studying the wants of his patrons, until his house has become a household word in Mamaroneck and vicinity. To say that he has made a success out of it would be putting it mildly indeed.

He has a good run of association pictures, and when he thinks the people want it, he runs vaudeville, and is always on the lookout for novelties of all kinds. On Monday nights he has a dramatic stock company which plays his theater each week, thus catering to the wants of all classes of patrons.

This enterprising manager is an extensive real estate operator, but is never too busy with his other interests to look after the management of his theater, and the welfare and comfort of his patrons.

This beautiful little theater seats something over 600, has a good size stage, good scenery, and comfortable dressing rooms. In the basement, which has been fitted up in first-class shape, dances and parties are held, thus making the Auditorium the one amusement place in Mamaroneck.

In view of the fact that it is situated within a few minutes' car ride from larger towns, beaches, and summer resorts, and plays to a good business all summer long, Mr. Brand deserves credit for his able management.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

A SPECIAL train of twelve cars, including dining and baggage cars, pulled out of Chicago for some point in the southwest, with 350 people aboard, in charge of two Essanay producers, Thursday morning, May 30. These people, comprising Essanay stock companies in the East, and men and women who will be required in the production of the big feature film "The Conquest of Mexico," will be engaged for two weeks or more amid scenery that will convey as closely as possible the atmosphere of the story. Great scenic pieces that have required many weeks in painting have been taken along in the flat and in roll, and complete preparations have been made beforehand in order that the production may be made without a hitch from the start.

Producers Webster and Whorton and Messrs. Stevens and Holmes, collaborators of the story, will have critical supervision of the production, and V. R. Day, manager of the city office, will attend to the business end. Geo. K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Co., passed the word several months ago that the question of expense must not be considered in this film, which requires investitures on a lavish scale and spectacles and pageantry of impressive grandeur and beauty. Mr. Spoor long since determined that his first big feature special must form a lasting landmark in the history of the Essanay product, and its release will be awaited with much interest by Licensed exhibitors.

The Toledo Convention.

The officers of the Toledo Motion Picture Exhibitors' League report a carefully outlined program for the convention in that city, on July 16 and 17. One thousand exhibitors are expected from Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania. The Zenobia theater and Zenobia Hall, both under the same roof, in the center of the business district, have been secured for the meetings and exhibition purposes.

Manufacturers of machines and supplies and representatives of supply houses are assured of the most considerate treatment, and Licensed and Independent film manufacturers will have separate places to exhibit their product.

Instead of the customary banquet, on the last night of the convention, there will be a moonlight ride on the Maumee River, Maumee Bay and Lake Erie, on the first night of the convention.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The following telegram was sent out by the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Co. on May 25 to exchanges:

"Beginning with release of June 10th, inclusive, and all subsequent releases, the following brands will be shipped direct by the manufacturers and not through the Sales Company: Imp, Victor, Rex, Gem, Powers, Bison, Ambrosio, Itala, Nestor, Champion."

G. P. Hamilton, general manager of the St. Louis Motion Picture Co., arrived in the city Sunday, May 26, and returned home the following night. Mr. Hamilton is much encouraged over the increased demand for film of the Shamrock brand. The increased demand has been specially marked during the last three weeks. Three releases weekly have been made of late and they have given great satisfaction to exhibitors, Mr. Hamilton said.

The Royal Theater, Newcastle, Ind., was opened Wednesday, May 15. The house is owned by Peter Kaler, and is described as a beautiful structure by the Newcastle Daily Courier. The front and interior, which are the work of the Directors' Supply Co., of Chicago, are referred to as being attractive and ornate.

The Americus Feature Film Co., this city, is in receipt of a wire from its camera man, who is down on the Mexican border, that he has succeeded in getting some fine pictures of the Mexican army and of the ruins at Juarez. He also wires that he has some pictures showing the evolutions of Mexican cavalry in the field, in action.

M. S. Ludick, owner and manager of the Crescent Theater, Milwaukee and Drake avenues, this city, was a visitor at the World office last week. The Crescent is one of the handsomest moving picture theaters in the city. It will seat 800 people and has both an attractive interior and an excellent system of ventilation. It will be run all through the summer. Licensed service, furnished by the G. F. Co.'s branch at 435 N. Clark street, is used. The admission is 5c. Business has been most satisfactory up to the present time, Mr. Ludick states.

Miss Ethel Hopp, daughter of Joseph Hopp, owner of the Standard Film Exchange, this city, has won the silver medal in the first series of contests for declamation under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. Miss Ethel recited "The Ninety and Nine," by Richard Harding Davis. Five medals were awarded in these contests, one for each of the five districts into which the city is divided. Miss Ethel won the medal in the contest for the North Side district.

As the hot weather approaches, the big downtown theaters are taking to moving pictures. Kinemacolor pictures of the Durbar are being given at the Lyric; Bernhardt and Rejane are seen in tradegy, on the curtain, at the La Salle; Lyman H. Howe has opened at the Palace Theater, featuring the "Burial of the Maine," and Paul J. Rainey's "African Hunt" pictures are being shown at the Colonial. The Rainey pictures are handled by Joseph Bickerton and Willie Harris, and were shown for the first time in this city Monday, May 27, to an excellent house, with admission prices from 25 cents to one dollar. Lyman H. Howe's prices run from 25 cents to 50 cents, and the La Salle charges the same. It certainly looks as if moving pictures were coming into their own, on a high tide.

VALUABLE FILM STOLEN.

Dr. W. R. Blake, of Vancouver, B. C., writes The World that his operator, Harry Sherwood, disappeared on April 17, last, with a valuable reel of pictures showing scenes in New Zealand and Hawaii. A reward of $50 is offered for information that will lead to the recovery of the stolen property. Dr. Blake is a scientist and explorer and the pictures taken by him have great scientific value. Information should be addressed to him in care of J. Y. McNaught, 68 Exchange Building, Hastings Street, Vancouver, B. C.

Doings at Los Angeles.

World Correspondent Contributes Interesting Budget of News—Many Happenings in American Producing Center.

SCORE another triumph for the motion pictures! Two big churches in Los Angeles have adopted them and will use them regularly in connection with the church work. Christ Episcopal church, the largest and most fashionable congregation in the city, has contracted with the General Film exchange for a regular service. The reels will be used not only as a part of the regular Sunday School services but in the institutional work of the church as well. In the Sunday School services only religious subjects and Biblical stories will be used. The effort will be to get reels which have a direct bearing on the Sunday lesson.

During the week one or two evening entertainments are given in the Parish House, where the motion pictures make up the chief portion of the program.

The other church which has adopted them is Salem Congregational church, also with a large congregation and perhaps the most influential church of that particular denomination in the city. Rev. B. H. Reutepohler, pastor of Salem church, believes that the motion pictures, if they have the right tone, can be made one of the strongest instruments of Christianity, and he has shown his faith by his works.

The motion pictures have no stronger friend and advocate, nor any more enthusiastic prophet than Rev. Baker P. Lee, the strenuous rector of Christ church. He had courage to defy that narrow sentiment which was inclined to denounce the motion pictures without investigating them or knowing anything about them, and he adopted them in the church work. They have now been in use for several weeks, and they have more than demonstrated their worth, according to Rev. Mr. Lee.

"The moving picture is one of the most wonderful inventions of modern times," he says. "They have given civilization a new and powerful instrument for the propagation of ideas—they have furnished a new mode of expression. Already, although they are but in their infancy, they are exerting a wide influence, and I am gratified to observe that the general tendency is toward the elevation and refinement of the subjects. I confidently believe that they are destined to become one of the largest factors in the uplift of humanity. In the Sunday School and institutional work of the church they have proved wonderfully helpful in stimulating interest in the church's work. They have more than fulfilled our expectations, and I don't see how we could get along without them."

Among the subjects which have been exhibited in the Parish House recently were "Taft in the White House" (Vitagraph), "The Seventh Son" (Vitagraph), "Becky Gets a Husband" (Lubin), "Rice and Old Shoes" (Lubin), "Cain and Abel" (Pathe), "Princess Charming" (Pathe), "Church and Country" (Edison), "Brave Hunter" (Pathe), "Alkali's Boarding House" (Essanay), "The Ranch Widower's Daughter" (Essanay), "The College Girl" (Lubin), "Laughing Gas" (Pathe), "Knowing Birds" (Urban), "Help! Help!" (Biograph), "Scroggins' Corner" (Vitagraph), "Abraham's Sacrifice" (Pathe), and several Pathe Weekly reels.

W. N. Selig, head of the Selig Polyscope Company, is due to arrive in Los Angeles next week. He is coming to supervise a production which the Western company is ready to make and which will be the biggest thing it has ever attempted. Reference was made to it in this column last week and to the elaborate preparations which have been made by Western Manager Magee, but Mr. Magee says it is still too early to announce the name of the subject. It is expected that Mr. Selig will make an authoritative statement about it upon his arrival.

The Bison Company is to have two organizations instead of one in Southern California hereafter. The one company which has been used in recent two-reel productions has been gradually increasing in size until lately it reached such mammoth proportions as to become unwieldy. The big company has now been split into two parts, one about half as large again as the other. The new "big" company is to be under the direction of Thomas H. Ince, who will turn out two and three reel Western dramas. The smaller company, under Francis Ford's direction, will engage in the production of Western comedies and dramas calling for smaller casts.

The Bison people say they are having difficulty in getting photoplays and invite writers to submit scripts on the following subjects: Western Comedy, Military, Mining, Emigrant and Pioneer. Big Western stuff for two-reel productions is especially desired. In connection with this information and for the guidance of photoplay writers, it should be noted that the office of the Bison Company has been moved to 1712 Alessandro Street, Edendale, Los Angeles, California. Although the offices will remain in Edendale the studio will be maintained at Santa Monica, and the field companies will work near the studio.

A tall, well-dressed, prosperous-looking individual with a businesslike air blew breezily in from San Francisco May 13 and announced that the National Film Corporation of New York, Denver, Salt Lake City and San Francisco had invaded the Southern California field. He added the information that Adolph Meyer, formerly with Turner & Dahnken, of San Francisco, would be the local representative, the same being none other than himself. Then he proceeded to get into action. Within twelve hours he had temporary headquarters opened at 756 South Main Street and partly furnished. A drayman was hired and sent off to the railroad station and in an hour or two later, when he unloaded several boxes of reels, the local branch had a stock to begin business with. Since then Meyer has been getting acquainted with the exhibitors and locating among them a number of old acquaintances.

"This is going to be a sure-enough independent exchange," Meyer announced. "Independent of the Association and of the Independents. We will handle films from about eighteen independent manufacturers outside the General and the Sales companies, and in addition we will have a number of the big special features. We're here to stay."

News of the Theaters.

Recognition of the fact that motion pictures have come to be one of the necessities of modern civilized life has moved the management of the big fashionable Coronado hotel near San Diego to provide regular performances for patrons this summer. The hotel, together with the famous Tent City, is located on a long, narrow island in San Diego Bay opposite the city proper. It is one of the three most fashionable resorts in California. A motion picture theater, which will be operated by Charles Detzell, a capable, experienced exhibitor, will be one of the conveniences of the hostelry. Great pains are to be taken in the selection of the reels which will make up the program, and they will have to have recognized artistic merit before they can be shown.

Long Beach, a suburb of Los Angeles, and another popular summer resort on the Pacific ocean is to have at least three new motion picture shows this summer in addition to a half dozen now in operation. Ground has been broken for two new theaters just east of the big pier. These will be devoted entirely to pictures. Another big house, which is being erected at Fourth and Pine streets, will be used for pictures and vaudeville. It will have a seating capacity of about 1,500.

One more picture house at Ocean Park is announced for next week. It has just been completed and is being furnished this week.

The Kinemacolor Theater, formerly Tally's, in the heart of the Los Angeles business district, and one of the biggest and most prosperous of the theaters devoted exclusively to motion pictures, has again changed hands. It is now under "Q" management and will be operated in connection with the "Q" chain of houses, which is growing monthly.

W. A. Trintz is building a picture house at 16th and Valencia streets, close to the district where the Los Angeles millionaires have their palaces. It is rather remote from the business district, but Trintz is spending nearly $15,000 for the building alone and expects to get enough business from the beginning to keep 550 seats occupied at every performance. He will use Licensed pictures exclusively.

H. C. Nixon, of the Globe Amusement Company, is building another big exclusive picture theater on Sunset Boulevard. The estimated cost is not available, but it looks from the outside like an investment of about $25,000. This makes the fourth theater the Globe Company has started and its plans are to keep building until it has erected fifteen houses, for which locations have already been picked.

The new Casino Theater at San Diego is rapidly nearing completion. It is scheduled to open June 1. The building cost $15,000 and will seat 780 persons.

The Unique Theater at San Bernardino, which has been closed for some time, has just reopened under the management of Brumley & Griffiths.

About People.

Frank Huff, salesman for the Edison Company, accompanied by Mrs. Huff, has been here on business and has moved on. He was selling and demonstrating Edison machines.

A. P. Tugwell, one of the pioneers in the exchange business, and formerly the head of the local exchange handling the Independent releases, has organized the Up-to-Date Film Exchange and opened offices in the San Fernando Building. He will handle nothing but big features. Tugwell is personally acquainted with every exhibitor in this section and is well liked. At present he is also one of the members of the Municipal Censor Board.

F. J. Balshofer, manager of the Bison Company, has gone to New York City on a business trip and will be gone about two weeks.

Harold Lockwood, formerly of the Nestor forces, has been engaged by the Bison Company to play leads and heavies.

Jean Hathaway, lately character woman with the American company, has joined the Bison company for similar roles.

The Bison company has just "discovered" a new character woman in the person of Nan R. Burbank.

Gertrude Clair, who was recently sent for by the Nestor management to be one of the new character women of the company, has just arrived here from New York and will go to work at once.

Madeline West, former leading woman with the Bison company, has joined the Kalem Company at Glendale. She is an expert horsewoman and an athletic girl, and George Melford, the Kalem director, is said to be preparing several dramas designed to make use of her exceptional talents in this direction.

Jefferson Osborn is a new leading man who is now on his way here from New York to work with the Nestor company at Hollywood.

Joe De Grass, of the Pathe forces, is back at the Pathe Western studio in Edendale after a year's absence, during which he worked with the Pathe Eastern company.

Princess Redwing.

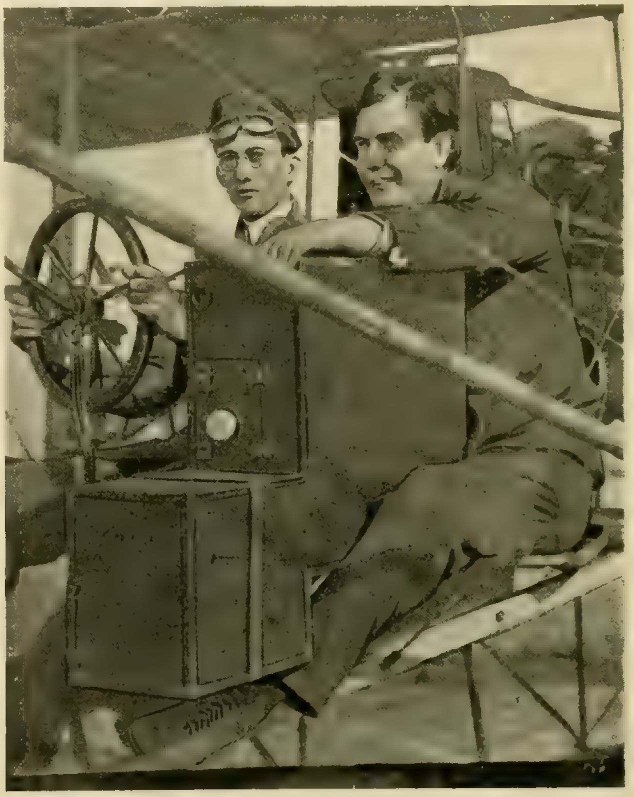
George Gebhart, formerly director of the Lux company at Hollywood, and later a leading man with the Nestor company, has gone over to the Pathe Western company and will play all the Indian leads in future. This is his forte and James Youngdeer, the Pathe director, is writing a series of Indian romantic dramas to feature Gebhart and Miss Winona Redwing, who is usually known in the pictures as "Princess Redwing."

James Youngdeer, director of the Pathe Western company, is preparing to take his players to the mountains next month to be gone all summer. The location has not been definitely announced, but rumor makes it seem probable that the company will go to Lake Tahoe. If it does, the motion picture fans may be prepared to see some beautiful backgrounds in the Pathe pictures in the near future, for some of the loveliest mountain lake and pine woods scenery in the United States is located in the vicinity of Tahoe.

Clune's Main Street Theater was the house that was fortunate enough to get the first showing of Selig's "Coming of Columbus" and, although the theater is one of the largest in the city and the picture was kept on a full week instead of the usual three or four days, they were still turning them away at the last performance.

The W. H. Clune Co., operating picture theaters of large capacity in Los Angeles, Pasadena, Santa Monica and Venice, has just been incorporated with a capital of $2,000,000. Other theaters are to be acquired or built, it is said.

Two reels have been condemned by the Municipal Censor Board since it began operations two weeks ago, and in each case exhibitors were compelled to take them off the programs. One film was held to be objectionable because it showed a part of a bullfight, and Campbell & Stutz, proprietors of the Shell Theater, on Broadway, were notified to stop exhibiting it. The other objectionable picture was a cockfight exhibited by Quinn Bros., of the Electric Theater, Main and Temple streets.



HUMPHREY TAKING AEROPLANE PICTURES.

Floyd Humphrey, camera man for the Nestor Film Company, of Hollywood, Cal., and Bayonne, N. J., made a 25-minute flight in a hydro-aeroplane as the guest of Glenn Martin, May 17. The flight was made at Balgoa, a seaside resort near Los Angeles. Humphrey took up with him a 100-pound camera and obtained pictures of beach, ocean, suburban cities and distant islands as the landscape rapidly unrolled beneath him. The films he took will soon be flashed on the screens of motion picture theaters all over the United States, for the Nestor Company is preparing to put them out in some form.

Humphreys was strapped to his seat and his camera was lashed with ropes to the frame of the aeroplane. When he descended and was released from his position he said he had enjoyed the experience immensely.

BARTLETT IN FEATURE FILM GAME.

Al L. Bartlett, road representative of the Consolidated Film & Supply Co., has resigned his position with the above concern. Last week he purchased the interest of H. R. Mason and now controls the Great Southern Feature Film Co., of Atlanta.

This company now owns the state rights on a line of features and Mr. Bartlett proposes to add regularly to his stock, insuring exhibitors in this territory regular bookings of high-class subjects. The wide experience of Mr. Bartlett in the film business will insure his patrons of good selections and proper exploitations.

Important Historical Subject.

American Film Mfg. Co. Will Produce a Two-Reel Picture Dealing with Blackhawk, Famous Indian Chief.

An important historical subject in two reels entitled "The Fall of Blackhawk" is announced for early release by the American Film Manufacturing Co. The producers are of the opinion that this picture will prove exceptional among those of its class. It was suggested, in a way, by the splendid reception given a previous educational subject showing the ocean's bed, produced by that company some time ago.

"The Fall of Blackhawk" deals with those stirring events in the famous Blackhawk war still remembered by a few remaining old residents of Wisconsin and Illinois whose parents participated in those early days.

Abraham Lincoln was a private at the time. He was 24 years old when the war broke out and promptly enlisted with General Winfield Scott, then in charge of the American forces. Oddly enough, the first acquaintance between Lincoln and Jefferson Davis occurred at that time, for Davis was then a West Point graduate and bearing a lieutenant's commission. Zachary Taylor, afterward president of the United States, was then a colonel and the man who subsequently captured the redoubtable Blackhawk.

Thus, in the space of three short years, the battlefields of early Illinois were the meeting places of four of the greatest figures in the history of America—Lincoln, Davis, Taylor and Scott.

There is a delightful romance with which history supplies us and which is shown in the two-reel subject. This is the elopement of Jefferson Davis with Sarah Taylor, eldest daughter of Zachary Taylor, and their subsequent marriage. Incidentally, this places Zachary Taylor in a unique position among American patriots—he was president of the United States with his younger daughter, Elizabeth, mistress of the White House, while his elder daughter, Sarah, was the wife of Davis and mistress of the White House of the Southern Confederacy. The stirring love scenes which actually occurred in those days are made a central figure of interest in this remarkable production.

The pictures open with the signing of the treaty with the chiefs of the Fox and Sacs tribes at Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830. Blackhawk reluctantly signed this treaty which was to cause all lands east of the Mississippi to become property of the whites. That famous incident which really started the war is portrayed—the shooting, by drunken rangers, of four Indian emissaries of Blackhawk, bearing the white flag and about to surrender to Gen. Scott. When news of this atrocity reached Blackhawk, he prepared to fight. What followed makes two of the most instructive reels of film ever released in America.

Much thought and research was given the production from all angles. Harry Launsdale, that famous impersonator of Abraham Lincoln, was secured to play that role; history was closely followed in regard to Davis, Taylor, Scott, and the equipment used in those days so as to present an accurate picture of the times. No period in history has thrown into the same environment four characters who afterward played such prominent parts in American affairs. There is adventure and life enough to satisfy every taste; there is an attention to details and a thoroughness of production that should delight the critic, and above all, there is an exact portrayal of one of the blackest periods in the early struggles of American pioneers.

FLICKERS.

A. G. Whyte, president of the Whyte-Whitman Company, 36 East 23rd street, sailed for Europe last week on the Mauretania. Mr. Whyte is probably one of the best known characters in the moving picture business, and at one time was known from coast to coast as the sole agent for the sales company. Mr. Whyte's stay will not cover over a month of strict business, at the end of which time he expects to return with the agency rights to market the product of several European manufacturers.

Mr. C. Spencer left New York last week on the Mauretania, after spending three months in and around New York on business and pleasure. Mr. Spencer is returning to Australia, via London, and expects to arrive in his home town some time in July.

I met Abe Warner this week, and he was so happy over the fact that in one day he sold three sets of film for Redemption, and two sets for The Glass Coffin, that he wanted me to tell your about it. Mr. A. A. Kellman, owner of the Victoria Theater, Lawrence, Mass., purchased a set of Redemption and Glass Coffin for New England. Mr. G. H. McNamara bought the Ohio State rights for The Glass Coffin, and Mr. C. R. Colter bought Redemption for Oregon and Washington.

Miss E. Thomas, Mr. H. E. Aitken's secretary, who is also treasurer of the Majestic Film Co., and one of the best known women in the film manufacturing and exchange business, returned to the New York office of the Mutual Film Corporation, after a short stay at her home in St. Louis, Mo., where she was called on account of her father's illness.

Mr. B. M. Burdick, of Los Angeles, Cal., has been in New York for the past ten days, and is making his headquarters at the Knickerbocker Hotel. Mr. Burdick is the owner of a well equipped and modern film manufacturing plant, including stock company, studio and factory, not mentioning the abundance of natural scenery at his command. Mr. Burdick expects to be granted a franchise from the Film Supply Co. of America.

MAC.

A REMARKABLE PERFORMANCE.

By F. H. Richardson.

Last week the writer visited the Lyceum Theater on 45th Street, which for some time has been playing to crowded houses, showing nothing but the Paul Rainey African films, with Mr. J. C. Hemment, the photographer who produced this marvelous piece of work, as lecturer.

The writer ran the Rainey films for Mr. Rainey at the Tennis and Racket Club, New York City, some months ago, and was rather disappointed in them. It seems that Mr. Rainey had, for that occasion, selected certain sections of the films, and these sections were apparently by no means the best part of the work.

The pictures shown at the Lyceum held the large audience from 8.30 until 11.00 p.m., with only one ten-minute intermission, and not only was everyone deeply interested every moment of the time, but there were frequent outbursts of applause as some of the spectacular and marvelously beautiful scenes were flashed upon the screen. The audience, which, as I have said, filled the house comfortably, had paid $1.00 a seat, and apparently, although the whole show consisted of moving pictures accompanied by Mr. Hemment's lecture, the patrons were more than satisfied with their investment.

It was a truly enlightening lesson as to the comparative value of moving pictures. There we sat comfortably in the auditorium of the Lyceum Theater in the center of the theatrical district of New York City, and were, to all intents and purposes, instantly transported into the heart of far-distant Africa. We saw the killing of the lion and the trapping of the hyena just as plainly, as vividly, and with just as complete detail of every movement and action as though we had spent hundreds upon hundreds of dollars and endured enormous hardship and personal danger to see the real performance on the spot.

Very few people in New York City have ever really seen a lion killed, yet, paradoxical as that statement seems, many thousands of them have seen the king of beasts meet his death. Very few people in New York City have ever looked upon the shores of Africa, to say nothing of its wide stretches of veldt, its dongas, its wild citizens and its still wilder animal life; yet thousands upon thousands of them are viewing these very things, just as realistically as they could possibly have been viewed had these people actually visited the domain of the Colored Citizen and the lion.

Mr. Hemment's lecture was truly remarkable—all the more so, in that it was his first appearance in public in that capacity. During the first half of the show he appears in the costume similar to that he wore when taking the pictures. During the last half of the show he appears in evening dress, and I am afraid that if Mrs. Hemment had heard the flattering remarks of the ladies in the audience, concerning Friend Jack's personal appearance, she might put a premature stop to his platform career.

Mr. Frank Hammond was the man "behind the gun" in the operating room, and his projection was, considering the difficulties under which he labored, excellent indeed.

KALEM'S JACKSONVILLE COMPANY RETURNS.

Kenean Buel and his company of Kalem players who have been working near Jacksonville, Fla., for the past six months, returned on the Clyde line steamship Monday, May 27, after a very successful season in the South. After a week of rest, Mr. Buell and his players will resume operations near New York.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League
OF AMERICA

OHIO CONVENTION AT TOLEDO.

Toledo Exhibitors Busy Making Preparations for a Big Meeting—Special Arrangements for Manufacturers.

DETERMINED to make a record breaker of the Toledo Convention of the Ohio Exhibitors' Association, the Toledo League No. 2 is getting things rapidly into shape for that meeting. Will C. Bettes, chairman of the finance committee, has issued a letter to the trade which outlines the plans in detail. The World gives space to the principal parts of the communication as follows:

"The Seventh State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio will be held in Toledo, Ohio, Tuesday and Wednesday, July 16 and 17, 1912. We expect to have no less than one thousand exhibitors from Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan.

"We are going to do things and do them right, and can assure all manufacturers of films, machines and accessories that none of the inconvenience, disappointment and other unpleasant features of all former conventions will be attendant upon this one.

"We have engaged two beautiful halls—one is the Zenobia Theater and the other Zenobia Hall—all under one roof and located downtown in the business district. Every facility for the exhibition of your goods and every courtesy possible will be extended to you. There will be a committee appointed especially for your benefit, and programs will be arranged in such a way that all exhibitors will be forced to visit the exhibition room.

"Manufacturers of films, both licensed and Independent, will have two separate places to exhibit their products, that all managers may have an opportunity to judge of each.

"Gentlemen, we realize that you have had much to complain of on account of the arrangement and treatment accorded you in all former conventions, and we wish to impress upon you that there will be none of that at this meeting.

"The Exhibition Hall is a large banquet-room adjacent to the theater proper, where the meetings will be held, and the space that you select will be allotted and reserved for you, and we guarantee when you come that the same will be at your disposal and not occupied by someone else. We also guarantee that the visiting exhibitors will see your display.

"There will be no banquet, but on the night of the sixteenth (the first night of the Convention) there will be a moonlight ride on the Maumee River, Maumee Bay and Lake Erie, with a buffet lunch served on the boat. This is planned for the first night because banquets and other blowouts of former conventions have taken place on the last night when the majority of exhibitors have returned to their homes."

M. P. EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE ARRANGEMENTS FOR CHICAGO CONVENTION.

Arrangements are being made to run two special trains to the Chicago Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Convention to be held at Chicago, beginning the second Tuesday in August, 1912; one to start from New York City by way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Huntington, W. Va., Cincinnati, Indianapolis into Chicago. The other trains: One will leave as follows: Albany, New York, going through Buffalo and Erie to Cleveland. The train leaving Pittsburgh, Pa., going through Youngstown to Cleveland, will join the Albany train at Cleveland, and from Cleveland through Sandusky, Toledo, South Bend to Chicago. These special trains will be solid Pullmans and will be fully equipped for the convenience and pleasure of the motion picture exhibitors. All exhibitors in adjoining territory will be notified of the schedule of the trains. Every exhibitor in the United States and Canada is invited to attend the Chicago Convention. Big preparations are being made for the accommodation and entertainment of visiting exhibitors.

Arrangements have been made with the La Salle Hotel, where headquarters will be established. Two large halls will be at the disposal of the exhibitors. The entire eighteenth floor of the La Salle Hotel will be devoted to those who wish to make exhibits. All of those who intend displaying their goods at the convention are advised to write the La Salle Hotel and make arrangements for reservation at an early date. Headquarters of the local committee at Chicago have been established on the third floor of the Orpheum Building Theater.

M. A. Neff, president of the league, will make a trip east in the interest of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America for the purpose of perfecting state organizations and promoting the interests of the Chicago convention.

The following is the Chicago executive committee on arrangements: W. J. Sweeney, chairman; R. R. Levy, C. L. Hull, C. C. Whelan, C. A. Anderson, S. I. Levin, I. Natkin, C. Abrams, F. Schaeffer, J. A. Olcock, H. A. Hill. Every member of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America is requested to give the Chicago convention as much publicity as possible. We confidently expect not less than four thousand exhibitors to attend the convention at Chicago.

As evidence of the great interest being taken in the League organization, quite a few unrepresented states are making application for membership and the Cincinnati Headquarters is a beehive of activity. Very truly yours,

M. A. NEFF,
President, M. P. E. L. of A.

State and Local News.

The Ohio State League is in a very prosperous condition. Cincinnati Local held a meeting at the Sinton Hotel, Monday, May 13th. M. A. Neff presented a part of the new code which is being drafted and, so far as it was complete, was adopted. At the next meeting the full code is expected to be read.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Cincinnati Local No. 2, raised $400. They decided to keep a fund at all times in their treasury not less than $500, in order that the interests of the Local might be efficiently looked after.

The State Organization of Kentucky reports many new members. G. M. Wesley, organizer for the state of West Virginia, reports that all of the exhibitors in West Virginia are joining the League.

Indiana will hold a convention in the near future. A very large attendance is expected.

The Ohio State Convention is to be held at Toledo on the 16th and 17th of July. Toledo confidentially reports that they will break all former records and show the boys just how to handle a convention.

ED. WHITE'S CHURCH FILM PARTIES.

Mr. Ed. White, manager of Weber's Theater, Broadway and Twenty-ninth Street, New York, which during the summer season has been given over to pictures, although new in the film game, brings to his latest venture the training and experience of the old-time theatrical man. One of the features he has instituted is the church theater party. On Monday night of the week of May 27 every box of this theater—and the boxes on the mezzanine floor accommodate 140 persons—and many chairs on the ground floor were taken by a party from the Church of the Divine Inspiration. Wednesday night Manager White entertained the Mary Arden Shakespeare Club. Friday night Mary E. Chapin took 200 chairs on the main floor and all the boxes. The previous week there were large parties from the Professional Women's League and the Actors' Church Alliance.

The operating booth at Weber's displaces two boxes on the mezzanine floor, so placed in the center of the house as to give perfect projection. Two brand new motor-driven Simplex machines are placed but forty-five feet from the screen. There are no tedious waits, the trailer of one film dissolving into the title screen of the succeeding picture. The service is Independent.

ANOTHER NEW THEATER FOR NEWBURGH, N. Y.

Mr. George Cohen, who owns several of the largest motion picture theaters in towns located on the Hudson River, is erecting a second theater in Newburgh, N. Y. Mr. Cohen uses the "Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer." Through Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," he has purchased two Powers No. 6 machines for this new theater. Mr. Hallberg reports a brisk trade in moving picture equipments of all kinds from widely scattered territory.

HELEN GARDNER TO HAVE A COMPANY OF HER OWN.

The beautiful and talented leading woman who appeared as Becky Sharp in "Vanity Fair" and played the principal part in many other great photodramas, such as "Regeneration," is organizing a company and will enter upon the production of five-reel feature plays under the direction of Charles L. Gaskill. Miss Gardner has created more than a hundred important parts, including Sabina in "The Illumination," the wife of the Caliph in "The Miracle," Linda in "The Serpents," and is not only a consistent and intelligent actress but makes a powerful visual appeal by virtue of her natural loveliness and her intense personality.

MISS HELEN GARDNER.

Charles L. Gaskill has all the qualities of an art director—fine literary ability, a very marked faculty of imparting to others his own ideas and standards of belief, quick artistic intuitions and a thorough knowledge of dramatic construction. He has produced and written twenty or more notable photodramas—"Winning Is Losing," "The Cave Man," "The Serpents," "The Illumination," "The Hieroglyphic," "Written in Sand," "The Heart of Esmeralda," "His Mother's Shroud," "Over the Hills to the Poorhouse," "Abou Ben Adam," "The Miracle," "Mrs. Carter's Necklace," and others. He is one of the few men who can enter upon the production of photodramas with a broader view than that which is purely mercenary and selfish. His ideals are high, but he is not sympathy-proof; he is willing to help as well as cheer, entertain and instruct the rest of us. The organization up to date looks like a strong combination.

"Clownland" is the title of a picture to be released by the Imp Films Co. on Saturday, June 22nd. It is the story of a little boy who dreams a dream. He dreams that he goes to a circus performance. For the purpose of making the picture, the Imp Company engaged the services of a well-known troupe of artists in New York City, and the resulting picture is full of the realism of the stage. This picture will unquestionably please the children wherever shown.

The Shriners' National Convention recently held at Los Angeles, California, forms a part of the Imp Saturday split of June 8th. In this picture are depicted many interesting events, chief among them being the Grand Parade, in which there are many beautifully decorated floats and other vehicles.

"A Soldier's Heart."

Cines Military Subject of Surpassing Interest and Vivid Portrayal—Kleine Release.

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

GEORGE KLEINE has in the martial drama, "A Soldier's Heart," by Cines, a subject that promises much more than average success. It will be released June 11th. This film must not be confounded with "Scenes of the Italian-Turkish War," another fine war subject by the same manufacturer, to be released June 8th. The latter shows modern war as carried on at long distance range by heavy guns, both on shore and on battle ships; "A Soldier's Heart" gives us vivid scenes of close conflict, with thrilling hand-to-hand fighting between Italian soldiers and the Arabs. The former pictures show actual occurrences on the battlefield; the latter gives a depiction of scenes, most likely to have happened during the advance of the Italian forces into the desert.

The scenario of this subject has been excellently constructed, and the introduction of the little Arab girl in the story diverts one from the stern exigencies of war to the gentle emotions that sway the heart, even in the midst of war's fell carnage. The fire of the Italian sharpshooters, behind the breastworks, on the enemy; the wild charge, in the open, on the Arabs; the fearful attack in the narrow street, and the sacking of the building in which the fleeing foes seek refuge, have all the realistic imprint of war's sanguinary details.

Scenes from Kleine's Cines Release, "A Soldier's Heart."

Who will fail to be moved by that solicitude for the innocent and helpless displayed by the Italian soldier, grim with the smoke and stress of battle, when he spies the frightened Arab child, as she stares fearfully at the dead and dying in that house of slaughter? And who can fail to read the lesson that all the world's akin, when he views the demonstration of the soldiers in camp, as they welcome their comrade and the tiny alien girl whom he has rescued from death?

Then that scene where the soldier denies himself of his soup ration, giving it to the fatherless one while he is content with dry bread. How that picture makes the eyes glisten and the heart glow! And when the little one shares with him, offering him a heaped up spoonful of the more tasteful mixture as he munches the hard bread, one is proud of human nature, because the good in it always calls forth the good.

This film, though a war subject, is a sermon on the truth that true bravery and tenderness are ever allied, whereas recklessness and bravado are most often accompanied by cruelty. True bravery is ever based on the sense of duty, and Tenderness, that lovely handmaiden, is always in attendance, shedding tears over the evils that must be.

The film shows fine camera and technical work. The trying exterior scenes have been excellently pictured, as all the details have been well brought out. The acting of the principals and the action of the great force of supernumeraries are worthy of high praise. Indeed, I cannot see where either could be improved.

The opening scene shows the arrest of a Turkish spy by a party of Italian sharpshooters. The spy is brought before the commanding officer and his effects searched. Papers are found revealing that the Turkish force intends to attack the Italian post the next day.

We see the Italian soldiers firing rapidly behind a breastwork of sandbags, and note the falling of several from time to time. The order is given to charge the enemy and the breastworks are scaled. The Arabs pour a heavy fire from behind mounds and other effective points, but nothing can stop the onward rush of the Italians. The Moslems give way and the open ground is strewn with their dead bodies.

A stand is made by them in the mouth of a narrow street of the village, to which they have retreated. A terrific hand-to-hand struggle results. Again the Arabs flee, with the Italians in hot pursuit. The next stand is made in front of a dwelling, the walls of which are solid masonry. Up the entrance the foe is forced, followed by the victors, while the street is littered with the wounded and dead of both sides.

The interior of a large reception room in the dwelling next shows the [illegible] on the carpet. A little girl lies cowering on a divan. An Italian soldier discovers her and carries her from the scene, joining his companions who are conducting prisoners to the camp.

The soldier cares for the child with the tenderness of a father, envied by all his companions in arms. News of the little girl reaches the colonel of the regiment. With an escort he visits the soldier's tent and orders that the child be taken to the quarters of the Red Cross, where the ladies will take care of her.

The scene showing the leave-taking between the soldier and little Miriam is very affecting. She places her tiny arms around his neck, refusing to let him go. Finally the soldier says farewell and follows his colonel outside the tent. The latter, reminding him that it is the duty of a soldier to fight his country's battles, shakes his hand and marches off. There is a struggle between love of the little one and his duty in the soldier's heart and he, for a time, hesitates. But love of country and his flag prevails, and he turns his face once more towards the foe.

Scene from "A Soldier's Heart" (Cines).

On the same reel is a short film, entitled "Messina As It Is To-day." This is a finely photographed scenic that will be viewed with interest by all who have read about the earthquake which almost destroyed Messina a few years ago.

KLEINE'S PROGRAM FOR WEEK OF JUNE 8.

George Kleine's program for release for the week ending June 8th is exceptionally interesting. The Cines for Tuesday, June 4th, is a split reel containing a very clever comedy-drama entitled "The Trifler," and a charming scenic. "The Trifler" is a vivacious young woman who imagines herself in love with two young men at the same time. As the mood suits her she favors first one and then the other, exciting their jealousy to the point of desperation until one more clever than the other through an artful ruse compels her full attention on himself and finally wins her. The "Picturesque Scenes in Padua" show the palaces, churches, scenes along the river, and many other places of interest. It is one of the best panoramas the Cines Company have shown of Italian cities.

The Eclipse for Wednesday, June 5th, "In Days of Old," is a picturesquely costumed drama relating a romance of the period "When Knights Were Bold." It concerns the Duke de Granard, his beautiful daughter Diana, who is carried off by the bold Baron Morna; the rescue by the gallant Brissac, which handsome cavalier proceeds to fall in love with the kidnapped maiden; their many exciting encounters and narrow escapes in effecting the rescue, and their final return in safety to the palace of the Duke, where they are received with open arms and happily united.

Saturday, June 8th, will see the release of the splendid Cines film, "Scenes of the Turkish-Italian War," which was taken on the actual scene of the great conflict, and depicts with true realism and all the attending excitement the movement of the troops, the firing of the great guns from the fortifications, the shelling of the enemy's positions, the activity of the cavalry, infantry, artillery, and the bombarding by the great modern warships of the towns along the Tripolitan coast. The action throughout is live and vivid and the photography excellent.

MISS MAY BUCKLEY.

Probably the most important leading lady of the Lubin Company's five stock companies is Miss May Buckley, who has been featured and almost starred by many of the largest producers of the country. David Belasco may claim the credit of discovering her as a child when she was acting in a Chinese play in San Francisco. The piece was called "The First Born" and Belasco sent it to London with May Buckley in the roll of Lucy Tsing. There she attracted the attention of Charles Frohman, George Edwardes and other London managers and was engaged by Mr. Frohman to play in the John Drew company presenting "A Marriage of Convenience." George Edwardes then secured her for "San Toy," which delighted London for over a year.

May Buckley as "Yuki" in "The Japanese Nightingale."

Charles Frohman brought her back to New York to play in "Hearts Are Trumps," in which she held her own with one of the most notable companies ever organized. The cast included Amelia Bingham, E. M. Holland, Edwin Arden, Cecil de Mille and Jessie Busby. Again she divided honors with James O'Neil in the Liebler & Company's beautiful production of "The Manxman." In other Liebler productions she was equally successful and in turn became a prominent member of Henry W. Savage's players. One of Miss Buckley's greatest hits was the role of Michal in "The Shepherd King." Of this performance David Belasco wrote, "I am very proud of the little girl I brought from San Francisco. As Michal you seemed to me as if you had stepped out of the Bible." Miss Buckley is very emotional and intense, and the Lubin films are much enhanced by her acting.

$25,000 PICTURE HOUSE FOR EUGENE, OREGON.

Mr. C. S. Frank, a capitalist of Eugene, Oregon, has let a contract for the erection of a $25,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater in that city. Messrs. Lewis & Lewis, architects, have drawn plans for the house, and it will have a seating capacity of 750 persons.

UNSUITABLE PICTURES.

Pictures of various kinds have in days gone by been classed as "objectionable" and "improper," sometimes rightly and sometimes wrongly so. Under the present law of development we are brought, however, face to face with the fact that there are certain pictures which are "unsuitable." These pictures cannot be classed as "objectionable" in any sense of the word, but because they offend a certain and proper sentiment they cannot be allowed. This kindly and acceptable revelation came from Canada. When the "funeral ship" bearing the bodies of those recovered from the Titanic disaster arrived in Halifax, the Canadian authorities refused to allow the taking of pictures of so morbid, almost gruesome, occasion. It is also argued that the misfortune and grief of such scenes are too heartrending to be made the subject of a public attraction or spectacle.

A lady of well-known literary ability writes to the public press: "The grief of afflicted people should not be made to furnish entertainment to morbid-loving patrons of theaters; it seems almost ghoulish to allow them to gloat over such sad scenes, neither should such occasions be treated as spoils over which theaters can make money."

This same argument is made to apply to other pictures which offend the sensitive public, while feeding morbid seekers for entertainments of this character. If there are a proportion of morbid, hungry onlookers, at every sad scene, why cater to their tastes? Why not rather try to help them out of such a condition of mind instead of developing more of a kindred nature to swell their unprofitable ranks. One of the educational values claimed for the moving pictures is that they are mental invigorators, and, as pictures are now generally of a good moral tone, care must be taken that they also possess a mental force which shall never depress even if it is not positively stimulating. The effect of scenes of horror on an immature mind is exceedingly dangerous, and such pictures must be classed as "unsuitable" even if they do not come within the ban of censorship. Good, clean, sensible ideas freely exercised will prevent the accidental admission of these pictures, which, even if true to life and history, are not true to the standards of propriety in a repetition of that in which the original is painful.

A massacre and also a crucifixion scene have recently been enacted much to the discomfort of the majority of onlookers, and although it is advanced that they represent actual scenes, it should not be forgotten they are scenes which had better never been enacted in the first place, and to repeat them is to emphasize a hideous fault, and pleases only an inferior class of people.

THE "MOVIES."

There is a power in a good name and evil in a bad one. Slang and improper abbreviations are one of the well known weaknesses of America's careless speakers. Some time ago, when a competition was started to secure a good sound and universal name for the moving pictures, "photoplay" was selected. On this page it was pointed out that whatever value this name possessed it was very limited and, like its predecessor, "Nickelodeon," would not fill the desired purpose; fortunately "Nickelodeon" is dead; "Photoplay" is being so seldom used that it may soon be forgotten, especially so now that the abominable "movies" has arisen. Like all such words, it may not last a generation, but this is written with the wish to drive it into oblivion as quickly as possible. A very prominent New York paper in describing the elaborate preparations being made for the production of a series of "'63" war pictures, has the harsh and forbidding heading of "Educational War Pictures for the Movies." What an excruciating sound this has!—at once vulgar and repulsive. May these abominable incongruities stop at this point! They will if all moving picture people with any degree of culture will refrain from and also forbid the use of so objectionable a term. There is greater need for the popularizing of a higher standard of language when referring to the educational value of the moving picture. The writer recently asked a school teacher what she thought of the value of teaching by cinematography. Noticing a strange lack of grasp betrayed by the answer, by gently probing he found to his surprise that this teacher did not even know either the word "cinematography" or its meaning. There is a standard of culture in "Education by Cinematography." There is a depth of degradation (even in a newspaper) in "Education by the Movies." If "cinematography" is too much for the average tongue, keep to the "moving picture," but by no means must either abbreviation or slang reduce and degrade that which possesses educational value to "the movies." As "good fruit cannot grow on corrupt trees," neither can education grow out of ignorance, or culture out of vulgarity. May this aid in putting an early end to "the movies."

"What's in a name?" asks Shakespeare. "A rose by any other name may smell as sweet." This is not a truism, although often quoted as such. It may be a probability that when a name does not imply characteristics, it is of no importance how that name may be changed. The rose and the lily could change names without violence, as their names are not descriptive. "A good name is to be chosen rather than great riches" is a truism, and as true names are descriptive or characteristic, so the higher, truer, and better the name, the safer, greater and more permanent the character and reputation.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRESS AND WHAT CAUSES IT.

There surely cannot be greater progress than to so advance as to command not only the respect but the commendation and praise of former enemies; yet such is the case with the moving picture. In a letter to the New York Tribune from the Association of Neighborhood Workers which is signed by four representatives, they say: "We know how large a part the moving pictures occupy in the lives of the dwellers in the tenement houses, as a popular feature of cheap recreation. Not only the children but whole families resort to them." Thereby is endorsed an amusement which but a few months ago was considered a detriment in crowded districts. Concerning the now slight need for censorship in the moral regulation of the pictures, they further say: "We find the pictures quite generally inoffensive and often educational in quality. * * * Motion pictures are not only a form of dramatic art; they are used with telling effect in dealing with social problems and in social and political propaganda. Bearing this in mind, it seems to us that the power of suppressing any film so that it could not be shown a single time might produce unfortunate results."

These expressions are strong proofs of the progress of the moving picture, and it is well worth while considering the causes. To those able to look upon all the circumstances and conditions, they are twofold: superiority to censorship, and educational value. Some two years ago, during the painful days when the moving pictures had few friends and many enemies; and while everyone seemed to have a remedy for all the ills and attendant exaggerated evils, and more and more censorship was demanded, The Moving Picture World quietly and patiently contended that improvement would never come through outward pressure in censorship but through inward development and culture, which would rise superior to and make censorship unnecessary. Manufacturers generally having adopted this course, and the predicted results have followed. Added to this, the second great factor which has made secure and permanent the great progress everywhere recorded, full and due credit must be given to the educational power of the pictures. These have given tone and character in a more than anticipated measure. Education needs no censor; it only needs direction and application. The many laws and by-laws now being adopted are along these lines, and before long the Moving Picture places will be treated largely as schools and institutions are treated in that only precautionary oversight aimed at material and sanitary conditions will be exercised.

The credit must rightly be placed where it belongs, and it is a pleasure to know that the cause of the extraordinary progress and acceptability of the pictures to-day comes by the true law of growth which is always from within with only outward training.

THE GREATEST PICTURE.

The picture which should prove the greatest in the whole realm of picture making is now promised by the Kalem Company. This is no advertising title, exaggeration, or high-sounding phrase. The greatest picture that can possibly be produced under the great benefits and possibilities to-day with the cinematograph is the Life of Christ. To be the "greatest" it must be complete, truthful to the authentic accounts, literal and full. If it should fall short of this it will still be one of the great pictures, deserving a high place with wide distribution to carry lessons of great value, but only the complete work accepted by representative Christendom will be the greatest.

Great things are expected of the Kalem production and the writer does not hesitate to say that hopes are high, desires are deep, wide and thorough, and the Kalem people have before them a project of the greatest magnitude, and they will deserve and receive high praise for their production if it proves acceptable.

Nothing that has yet gone before them was even worthy of an entrance into the educational world; should the Kalem picture obtain that entrance (even if incomplete) it will be a great step forward.

The writer has had the privilege of seeing some of the first specimens or proofs of the scenes and locations pictured in the Holy Land where the Kalem people are at work. These first proofs show the thoroughness with which the work is being done. Places well known and others known only by tradition are being used as the true and natural background or foundation for the reproduction of those ancient scenes so markedly important in the life of Christ.

It is safe to say that should this work realize that for which it is hoped, it will prove but the beginning in a large field of greater Biblical productions which always prove the most satisfying and lasting pictures.

NOTES.

All Boy Scouts will be interested in the picture of a company of their comrades appearing in a "First Aid to the Injured" drill given in Washington, D. C., before the International Red Cross Conference as shown in Pathe's Weekly No. 22.

Every college in the world is always much interested in that oldest of intercollegiate sports—the Oxford and Cambridge annual boatrace. This battle between the Dark and Light Blues is about half a century old and is one of the events of every college year. Interest is always at high-water mark now, however; thanks to the moving picture, the actual event can be reproduced and interest will increase accordingly.

The modern schoolchildren's "Arbor Day" receives an impetus by a scene of the annual "Fiesta Arborea" held in Chico, Cal. The great Hooker Oak, the largest and oldest oak tree in the world, is the center of attraction.

A brief study of the releases shows that ten film makers are each producing an average of two educational films a month (not including Pathe's Weekly), which shows both an interest and upward tendency in a right direction. About four other firms are producing one each per month, so that we are now getting about twenty-four such pictures each month. Unfortunately there is not a concentrated interest or aim in these productions, which detracts from their value. Time, however, with its experience and the increasing knowledge of the requirements, will soon lead to a more carefully prepared series of subjects which will increase their value.

Every boy in America feels a sense of peculiar satisfaction when he has actually seen "Buffalo Bill," the most popular, the most unique American of his day. Col. Cody seems to have been the key to the West, he being among the first, yet truly the greatest, of the pioneers. Young America loves the Indians and owes a debt of gratitude to the man who brought them forward. That he, and his life, traits and characteristics, are to be preserved upon the immortal film is a great thing, for which posterity will be most appreciative. It will be a pleasure to point out the educational features of the picture after its release. They surely will be many.

It is most interesting and satisfactory to note that a higher grade of advertising is going with the pictures now. When the maker desires to attract and hold attention he says "an educational feature" now; he surely realizes that a solid, sober, truthful description is in the end most profitable; he also makes the picture justify the advertisement.

"The Harvest in Sicily," a C. G. P. C. film in the industrial series, is an interesting Old World picture, showing present-day customs almost as ancient as those extant in Egypt, besides lending additional interest in the "unchanged east." Ancient methods of sickle hand reaping and the threshing of the grain by means of horses and mules treading it out in circular fashion are shown. As there are several of these circles at work at the same time, it has the appearance of a multiple-ring circus. The harvest festival is as usual a procession with the singular oriental blending of the religious and burlesque characters. The sports with which the festivities close are quite unique. A number of horses are purposely terrified by having objects tied to mane and tail to increase their nervous fears, and venturesome youths are expected to catch them. While the idea seems a dangerous one the pictures show no unpleasant results, but rather the successful catching of the runaways.

"Industries in Cuba," is a representation of tobacco growing, the gathering, storing and drying of the leaves, in preparation for the making of those cigars for which the island is famous. The cutting and gathering of sugar cane is also shown. A street scene shows the selling of milk, the vendor riding a horse and carrying but few bottles; the extremely primitive nature of these scenes so close to the United States is astonishing. Most surprise will be manifested in the custom of mothers holding their babes to suckle from a goat, in continuance of the belief in the great value of goat's milk. This film is interesting in that it depicts the non-progressiveness of rural Cuba. A view of Morro Castle in Havana shows it to be a well-built, yet old-fashioned Spanish fort.

"Max Is Convalescent" is a good humorous film, especially so because the interest centers in two intelligent and well-trained animals—a pony and a dog. While this is a comic picture—its exhibition of the intelligence and training of these animals give it a very high character—it is much to the credit of "Max" that he so enhances the value of his genius for fun-making by using such valuable and well-trained aids; so that not only is there nothing ridiculous but everything entertaining, with the distinct object of inspiring a superior healthy mirth. Max is also to be complimented in that he submits himself to so much discomfort for the purpose of displaying the ability of his assistants. To allow the pony to throw him in the water and for the dog to rescue him put all three to a very severe test, making it a conflict between admiration for the ability displayed and the laughter at such genuine fun.

MIGNON ANDERSON—HER SECRET.

After this caption many will expect to read something thrilling about the popular Thanhouser player, but the World will clear the air by saying that the only connection between Miss Anderson and "Her Secret" is that her latest appearance is in a film of that name. The story is a dramatic one, released Friday, June 7, in which Miss Anderson plays a loyal sister who must provide for her little brother in secret; and shows Miss Anderson to good advantage. She has now been with Thanhouser Company over a year and is a strong favorite with the admirers of that concern's product.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN.

THROUGH the courtesy of Mr. R. R. Nehls, manager of the American Film Co., I had the pleasure of viewing their beautiful picture, "The Myth of Jamasha Pass," which was scheduled for release May 9. This production is worthy of being classed as a feature and deserves careful consideration by those who take pride in the musical settings of their pictures. Mr. Jas. S. McQuade gave a comprehensive synopsis of the story in the Moving Picture World, April 27, so I shall mention only enough of the more prominent details necessary for an understanding of its musical program.

In the first place, the picture deals with a legend, and the accompanying music should be of a mystical character. At the opening we see an old prospector in camp preparing his evening meal over a fire. An allegretto of a neutral character would be best here; not too lively, as I believe it would clash with the ensuing scenes. This continues until both young men join him. When they are seated, the old man tells them the legend of the mythical maid. Trinkaus' "Boreas" (suite of the four winds) will answer nicely if attention is paid to expression. Continue until young men lie down to sleep. Then something more mysterious. C. V. Stanford's "Oedipus Rex" (prelude), if played andante moderato instead of adagio, will carry out the character of the next scenes. Continue until the Maid vanishes; now a good dramatic mysterioso from any of the libraries of dramatic music till title: "And There Comes a Time, Etc." Neutral (intermezzo) till the Maid appears, then "Boreas" till "And Dissension Arose, Etc." Short neutral until they meet. Mysterious similar to the last till both men and the Maid together, then agitato; swell for fight and continue until man is thrown down the hill; subdue till "Ever Through the Night." Light semi-mysterious for the pursuit. (The first part of Greig's "Humoresque" opus. 6, No. 4) till "And the Legend of Jamasha Pass, Etc."; then "Boreas" till close.

A number of programs from the Liberty Theater, Salt Lake City, have been received. Space forbids giving all of them here, but the following is a fair specimen of the rest. Opening, Selection from Rigoletto. No. 1, "A Day in Venice." No. 2, "Selection from Faust." No. 3, "Brass Band Ephraham Jones." No. 4, "Ragtime Violin." No. 5, "Adieu." No. 6, Selection, "Mefistofele." No. 7, "Anathema" (pipe organ). No. 8. "Oh, You Darling" (from Miss Dudelsack). No. 9, "By the Saskatchewan." No. 10, "After Sunset." No. 11, "Tales from Vienna Woods." No. 12, "The Singing Girl" (selection). These are printed on the back of the program (four pages, 6 by 3), the two inner pages giving a short synopsis and title of the picture; numbers written at the beginning of each indicates the musical numbers played for the five films, thus: "How Washington Crossed the Delaware," 1 and 2, patriotic airs to end. "Those Hicksville Boys," 3 and 4. "Nemesis," 5, 6 and 7. "Oh, Those Eyes," 8 and 9. "The Social Secretary," 10 and 11. "A Funeral That Flashed in the Pan," 12. Besides a pipe organ the Liberty Theater has an orchestra of 10 pieces under the direction of Prof. Edgar Bayliss.

The following suggestions are offered:

"FOR THE PAPOOSE" (Pathe).

1. Indian music ("Os-ka-loo-sa-loo") till man seizes girl, then:
2. Short agitato till "That Same Night."
3. Mysterious till Indian kills sleeping man.
4. Hurry till "Next Morning."
5. Indian sentimental till man throws cloth over Indian girl's head.
6. Agitato till "Be Not Afraid, My Sister."
7. Mysterious agitato till struggle.
8. Hurry till man is seen dead.
9. Indian pathetic till end of picture.

"PAYING THE PRICE" (Lubin).

1. "Western" intermezzo ("Wildflower," "My Prairie Queen" or something similar) till Bert Adams seizes woman in third scene.
2. Agitato till he rides away.
3. Same as No. 1 for three scenes.
4. Agitato-mysterious till "Tell Ned Davis. Etc"
5. Agitato till "The Theft of His Horse, Etc."
6. Same as No. 1 till Ned enters his home. When he starts to leave house.
7. Hurry for riders. Subdue for interior and swell for outdoor scenes till "Let Me Take Him, Etc."
8. Heavier hurry for fire and struggle, p. and f. according to action till "You've Lost Your Cabin, Etc."
9. Intermezzo till close.

"THE OLD KENT ROAD" (Vitagraph).

This picture was suggested by Chevalier's coster song, "Wot Cher" or "Knocked 'Em on the Old Kent Road," and I think it would not be inappropriate to use other well-known songs of this writer in addition to the titular one.

1. Chorus of "Knocked 'Em on the Old Kent Road" till title: "Sue's Steady"; then:
2. "Mrs. Henry Hawkins" (Chevalier's Song) till "Good News."
3. Lively till "Knocked 'Em on the Old Kent Road."
4. "Knocked 'Em on the Old Kent Road" (whole song) till "The New Home."
5. "Mrs. Henry Hawkins" till "The Secret Drawer."
6. Lively till "Back to the Old Kent Road."
7. Same as No. 4 till they shake hands.
8. Lively till Sue and young man exit.
9. "Mrs. Henry Hawkins" (refrain) till end of next scene.
10. Lively till Sue and young man come down centre.
11. Chorus of "Knocked 'Em on the Old Kent Road" till close.

(A cheap book containing Chevalier's songs can be ordered through any music dealer.)

The Selig Polyscope Co. have issued piano music for their great three-reel subject, "The Coming of Columbus." This music is adapted by Mr. S. L. Rothapfel and, though I have not yet seen it, the reputation of Mr. Rothapfel is sufficient guarantee of its worth. Get it by all means.

SUGGESTIONS FOR PIANISTS.

By C. K. Aiken.

There is no more interesting picture to play for than Pathe's Weekly. Every class of music is needed from the popular to the severely classical. A little something brilliant at the start serves to arouse the attention of the audience and then, when once under way, each event should be followed faithfully. There are, of course, many funerals, and for these I recommend Mendelssohn's Funeral March from the Songs Without Words; Beethoven's Funeral March from the Sonata in A Flat, and the familiar march by Chopin. Among the Songs Without Words there is also one in F (the exact name has escaped me) which, while it is not a funeral march, has a funeral tread and can be made probably as effective as any of the marches

The Weekly calls for a complete knowledge of national airs. When the action is in a foreign country and no more appropriate music is at hand, then is the time to play a national air with variations and cadenzas ad libitum. However, each nation has composers whose music suggests the country almost as well as the patriotic airs. "Marche Slave" by Tschaikowsky is thoroughly Russian, while Schubert's "Military March" would not be taken for anything but German.

Many of the events shown cannot be followed musically. At these times the music should be light and pleasing, but not heavy, rather on the intermezzo style. A beautiful piece of this kind is Victor Herbert's "Badinage." All of Herbert's music, by the way, is good; he is a very capable composer; he writes musical comedies with the same care others use with grand operas. The final scene on the Weekly needs music which makes your audience hum. With a good tune ringing in their ears they go away as pleased with the music as with the picture.

Some pianists are just awakening to the fact that their playing is on the whole too loud. People enjoy pianissimo effects about as well as crashing fortes. Expression is the thing! The eyes of the audience are on the picture, but their ears take in the music just the same. Any musician who imagines his good efforts will go unappreciated had better think again.

OBSERVATIONS.

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE opening of the local airdome season has been seriously retarded by rains and the proprietors of the places have joined the baseball men in silent prayers for a change of weather. Many of the airdomes have been in shape for the opening for two or three weeks, while others have only been partly prepared. The greater number still await the annual renovation, the owners preferring to wait for a dry spell and not run the risk of loss by having the rain undo work rendered incomplete by wet visitations. Decoration Day has been fixed by many of the exhibitors for the formal opening of the season. This season there will be more airdomes in operation than in any preceding year, and yet there will also be a larger number of indoor shows than at any previous time. The modern houses are perfected for all seasons and the suspension of operations for the warm period is by no means as general as it was in the past; in fact, the change that has set in foreshadows a steady decline in the number of airdomes, particularly in the large cities and towns. Investors in such places are far less in number than they were a few years ago. Rainy spells make too great inroads in the receipts and the net profits are not looked upon as sufficient at the end of the season to repay the exhibitor for his outlay of money and the time devoted to the preparation and management of the places. Of course there are many exceptions. In the thickly populated sections open air amusement resorts are very popular and, weather permitting, the returns are good. But the big investors fight shy of offers of sites by real estate men and most of the airdomes are in the hands of the smaller exhibitors.

A recent visitor from the West was quite enthusiastic in his description of picture houses west of the Middle States, and a New Yorker with whom he conversed was forced to admit that greater pride is taken in the construction of the houses outside of the Empire State. The Westerner could not understand why this should be, and the home man could offer no other explanation than an adherence to economy rather than beauty. When the ordinance allowing increased seating capacity in the city has been passed, it is quite likely that future constructions in Greater New York will be of a character to more favorably impress our out-of-town friends. A good front should be put on in the moving picture business as well as in any other line. It is really more essential. A pretty front is a drawing card in itself and it is false economy not to have one. Many exhibitors are content with a display of glaring lights, which is a grave mistake. If the building itself is not attractive, the lights only emphasize the ugly features and increase the unfavorable impression. The front of the house conveys to the mind of the observer and amusement seeker an impression that creates a desire to see what is going on inside. This is especially true as to the transient trade and it is surprising that more exhibitors do not realize this. The idea of exhibitors in other parts of the country on outward display should be universally adopted. It is conceded that many exhibitors cannot afford to do so and it is a matter of but a comparatively short time when they will be obliged to step aside and let the men who take up the idea, and have the means to carry it out, get the coin.

The ordinance permitting the increase of seating capacity of motion picture houses in this city is by no means generally received with favor by the exhibitors of the city. The little man with small resources is frowning upon it. He sees the handwriting upon the wall. The big fellows and syndicates, he feels, will soon plant the more modern houses next door, opposite and all around him and he will become a "has been" so far as the show business is concerned. In a measure, he is to be sympathized with, but that is all that can be done for him. That inexorable rule of war and business that the weak must give way to the strong cannot be avoided. In many instances the new ordinance will be a boon to the motion picture business as a whole. There are many small exhibitors who have never qualified as purveyors of amusement to the smallest degree, and their places are a detriment to the welfare of the better class of houses. It is such places that have led to the frequent criticisms of the motion picture industry. The reformers, or those who pose as such, have greedily fed upon the opportunity offered by the management and appearance of such places to get in a knock on the business generally. It is some satisfaction to know that the parasites are doomed to elimination. Some of them are proclaiming that the new ordinance will bring losses to the film manufacturers and film exchanges, as their elimination will mean the retirement of far more customers than the new houses will bring. This line of argument has no foundation, in fact. The class of exhibitors referred to are noted for cheapness in everything—condition of their houses, character of their employees, quality of film service and everything that enters into the operation of their places. Picture houses that do not harbor vultures who prey upon women and children, and who have so frequently figured in the criminal courts during the past year or two, will bring increased returns to the producers and handlers of the pictures and eliminate many of the embarrassments to which the meritorious exhibitors have been unjustly subjected through the existence of the law-defying places. The proprietor of one of these places was loud in protesting a few days ago against the press condemning a picture house employing a fellow charged with a crime by a young woman. He only wasted his energy and breath when lodging the protest. It is notable that in almost every instance where such cases have come to light the charges have affected houses of the kind already criticised. The exhibitors who employ people of the character that have been frequently revealed must expect the severest censure. If they give personal attention to their houses and exercise ordinary diligence in the employing of people, their places cannot become the scenes of such crimes as have been charged.

Let us hope that the passing of the fake exhibitor is also near at hand. He is a serious menace to the business. What will more directly undermine the confidence of the public than the display of a bare-faced counterfeit to attract people to the box office? One house recently had before it three or four hoboes attired in the uniform of sailors and proclaimed them as survivors of the "Titanic" disaster. It was a cruel imposition that should not have been tolerated, even had the display been made in some low-grade place at one of the seaside resorts, where most people will stand for almost anything in the fake line as a novelty.

That Matinee Business.

HERE is a long letter from an exhibitor. It's the same sort of a letter that we fancy scores of others would like to write if they could get their courage up to the point of confessing partial failure, and because it deals with a subject of general interest we are going to take it up in greater detail than usual. The letter reads:

> I have had several years' experience in the show business, but I am comparatively new to the moving picture end of it. During the time I have been manager of this house your hints to advertisers have been a great help to me. We are doing fairly well, but not as well as we ought to. I will try to explain the conditions and perhaps you can make some suggestions that will help still more.
> We took this house March 1. It had changed hands several times and was terribly run down. It was dark and dingy and poorly ventilated. We closed it for ten days and made extensive repairs and alterations, including a Mirroride screen, 1912 Motiograph, new side exit, an indirect lighting system and beautiful decorations. We run Independent service, two weeks old, our projection is excellent and our pianist is unusually good at playing the pictures. I cannot say much about the singer because I do the singing, but I was soloist with one of the Lasky acts for two seasons. We have the best location in town.
> I enclose samples of our advertising. We run an ad in the local paper every day, costing from $1 to $2.50, and for all features we use about 2,000 dodgers, distributed principally among the business places and handed out to school children and at the various factories.
>
> Our night business is good; capacity two or three nights each week and a big turnaway on Saturday, but it is on the matinees that we fail to do the business.
> There is only one other exclusive picture house in town. Their location is not nearly as good as ours, but they have been established for a long time. The same man has conducted the house for years. He has a fine equipment and has always given a good show. His house is not as large as ours, but he only runs two reels. He uses Association service one week old.
> What I am driving at is the fact that his matinees are practically as good as his night business and the funny part of it is that the shoppers have to pass our place to reach his, as he is on a side street. Of course I make allowance for the fact that he is well established, knows every man, woman and child in town and that our place has long worn a "black eye," but even so, we should do a better afternoon business than we are doing.
> I might add that I do all the ushering and take a great deal of pains with the people. If you can suggest some way to boost our matinees I will appreciate it.

What Has Gone Before.

The question of matinee business has been dealt with extensively before, and we would suggest that our correspondent might find much that is of interest in the departments in the issues of October 28, December 23 and January 6. These three issues treat of some special matinee business, but there is much in almost every issue that should interest the novice in motion picture management; and experience in vaudeville or dramatic management does not always count for much with a photoplay theater because the conditions are so different.

Looking Over the Situation.

From the letter it is apparent that the inquirer is of good education, able to regard a situation dispassionately with a proper regard for the merits as well as the handicaps of his business rivals and with some general knowledge of the business. He has entered a strange town, purchased a house broken down through a succession of bad managements in spite of its location and after setting his house in order it would appear that he has started to run it precisely as he would a well established theater. That seems to be the trouble.

He does not realize that he must first break down the barrier of prejudice that has been built up by his predecessors, before starting to build up his own business. He has simply put his advertisements in the local paper, getting a very good return in space for the prices mentioned, and featuring his more important offerings through the time honored way of getting the dodgers out at the schools about the time the afternoon session is dismissed and the factories about the time they let out. The advertisements are well framed, but of the three samples sent, one advertises "A Victim of the Mormons," another a Bison feature and the third, "My Baby's Voice"; the only one of the three that might be looked to for afternoon business. The feature reels are both good, but where a special bid is being made for matinee crowds there should be something in every advertisement and each program of film that will appeal especially to the women and girls in their 'teens.

Ask Those Whom You Want.

A special dodger for "A Victim of the Mormons" should have made a strong appeal to the factory workers but those who work in shops and stores are poor patrons of the matinees, yet it seems that all dodger work is directed toward the factory workers, stores and school children. It is the theory that school children carry the circulars home to the family, but the percentage of those that actually get into the homes in this fashion is so small as scarcely to pay for the paper, let alone the printing. It may also be argued that the children will tease to be taken and so will get the parents into the theater, which is true enough where the releases make especial appeal to the children.

The chances are that in the earlier history of the house the women found that they were never certain of being free from insult in the darkened house, or if the moral tone was right perhaps it was dirty floors or unclean benches that made the house disliked.

It should not be difficult to find out just what the trouble had been and by announcing changed conditions to those directly interested begin a new order.

Give Away Some Tickets.

Follow one of the numerous plans for giving away tickets to the matinees that the habit may be formed. Don't make them absolutely free, but impose some sort of condition. Just at present in New York, the stores along Delancey Street from the Williamsburg Bridge to the Bowery are placarded with signs inviting the passer by to come in and get a free ticket to Loew's Delancey Theater, with the result that the house is cheapened, and the signs benefit neither the store nor the theater.

Suppose that the nearby drug store was enabled to announce that a matinee ticket to the Blank Theater would be given with every glass of soda sold between one and three o'clock. A woman gets the soda. She is certain of getting her money's worth on that. There is the free ticket to the conveniently located theater, much nearer than the house she usually patronized. It has cost nothing. She will drop in. If it is as bad as it used to be she does not have to stay.

She drops in and finds the place greatly improved. She stays on and when she goes out she tells her friends how different the Blank is under the new management and what a hustler Jones, the druggist, is to take advantage of the change of management to get the tickets for his soda patrons. Jones' soda business is bettered and the matinee audiences have been established.

Perhaps it is the leading department store that advertises that in order to encourage morning shopping tickets to the Blank are free to those who shop before one o'clock. That doesn't look as though you were begging for patrons and the patrons do not feel that they are doing you a favor when they come to look you over. You've carried your point and "saved your face" as the Chinese say.

Discount Tickets.

Our friend Wesley, in Gardner, Mass., has almost a mania for printing on his advertising this little

COUPON.
This coupon and 5c will admit anyone to a good seat at the Matinees of Moving Pictures and Vaudeville at Gardner Theater.

That's just another way of having a ten cent matinee for five cents, but to most women patrons it is five cents saved, and they are getting in for half price to a ten cent show instead of spending five cents on a nickel show.

In another theater every man entering the house is handed a small envelope on which is printed:

Take this Home to Your WIFE

Inside is a coupon to the same effect. Not all men visitors have wives, but someone gets the coupon because it is a coupon, and a coupon presupposes some special privilege.

Fight It Down.

In all your advertising fight down the old prejudice and build up the new establishment. Argue down the old belief that the house is dirty and the audience unkempt. Don't say so in those words, but talk about the new conditions of light, comfort and cleanliness. Talk about your new ventilating system. If you have none to talk about get one. If you can do no better cut a hole in the front of the lobby and put a small electric fan behind it. Put a grating over it and tie ribbons or small flags to the grating. The movement of the streamers is worth a column a day in the paper and half a dozen three sheets, but have it in the papers, too. "The atmosphere is like the program—always clean and fresh." "We change the program every day, but we change the air completely every ten minutes." "You do not have to see the same reel nor breathe the same air twice."

Get out some special circular work along the same lines. Hire three or four not too good looking girls to go from house to house offering a pair of complimentary matinee tickets and a little talk about the new house in the old one. Don't rest until every woman in town knows that the Blank Theater offers three reels instead of two, that the house is now a model of neatness, that the famous Marion Leonard will be seen there in Rex pictures and that Miss Lawrence can also be seen. Play up the personalities of the players against those on the Licensed side. Make your matinee girls, and hold them by seeing to it that they are always treated right. The trouble seems to be that our correspondent has been doing a little too much thinking and too little hustling.

How to Save $1.90.

Wouldn't you "fall for" a line like that if you saw it on the face of an envelope? Of course you would know that it was a catch, that somewhere you would run into the advertisement instead of the saving, but doesn't it look good to you? It looks so good to us that we are sorry that the line is made subordinate to the legend "To the Lady of the House." That Lady of the House line has been sadly overworked in grocery advertising, and if you had had to kick three or four cards with the same legend off the front stoop every morning, except Sunday, you would not care for it either, but the saving of $1.90 redeems this one. It is printed on a nine and a half inch manila envelope, put out by Geddes and McLaren, of the Princess and Sylvan theaters, Chelsea, Mich. Mr. McLaren writes:

> I am enclosing an advertising stunt which I am using for Sarah Bernhardt in "Camille," which we are using to-morrow night. It has attracted a lot of attention and promises to draw big crowds. This is only a town of 2,000, and we have to bill the town with hand-bills, etc., for feature attractions. The ordinary hand-bill is O. K., but wears itself out.

Here's a Chance for You

Sooner or later you'll have those Bernhardt reels. Mark this down against the time you get them:

> Chelsea, Mich., May 17, 1912.
> Dear Madame:
> Have you ever in the past picked up a daily paper and noticed that the great and divine
> MME. SARAH BERNHARDT
> was to appear at such and such a theater, at prices from $2.00 to $10.00, and then laid down the paper with a sigh and a wish that you might see her?—but such prices!
> But you can now have your wish gratified, for the management of the PRINCESS THEATER offers the great and only
> SARAH BERNHARDT
> in ALEXANDER DUMAS' Great Emotional Play
> "CAMILLE"
> on Tuesday evening, May 21, in three reels, or 3,000 feet of motion pictures, for which appearance she received $50,000.
> As she has never before appeared at prices less than $2.00, and you have a chance to see her for 10 cents, how easily you can save $1.90
> ---
> P. S.—In order to get the full enjoyment of the performance kindly arrange to be at the Princess at either 7:15, 8:15, 9:15 or 10:15, the starting time of each show.

And please note that the P. S. is good for other than the Bernhardt pictures. Whenever you have a two or three reel subject, use every endeavor to get the people in in time to see the start. Nothing hurts a show more than to see the half of the first reel, all of the second, and then the first half of that first reel.

Winstock Again

We are inclined to think that the long silence from the vicinity of Portland, Ore., is due to the fact that Melvin G. Winstock is "saving us up" for the time when his own photoplay, "The Convict's Parole," is released by Edison, and he proceeds to make a noise with the reel that Governor West helped him write, but in the meantime, the Pathe Freres send in a program of a luncheon of the Portland Ad. Club, which featured a Pathe cameraman and the Pathe Weekly. Mr. Winstock was Chairman of the Day and the program he arranged was this:

> "Growth of the Film Industry"
> Mr. Fred H. Rothchild
> President of the People's Amusement Company
> "Practical Demonstration of the Art of the Camera Man"
> Mr. Ralph R. Earle, of the Pathe Weekly
> "Pictures as an Aid to Education"
> Hon. D. Solis Cohen
> PATHE WEEKLY of Latest Date Exhibited on the Screen
> "The Distribution of the Product"
> Mr. H. C. Stevens, Jr
> General Manager of the General Film Company

All of which is very good for the Portland Ad. Club, the People's Amusement Company, Pathe Freres, the General Film Co., and Winstock, himself, who is getting to be so popular out there that he'll probably be in politics before long. Winstock can do almost anything he wants out there in the line of press work because he does not fake. Miss Florence Turner emerged from her vacation via the People's Theater, Portland, and it was here that Governor West lectured the Western Governors' film for the benefit of a charity. They do big things in a big way there and they do them right.

More from Carey Wilson

Carey Wilson, of the Criterion Theater, Rutherford, N. J., rises to remark:

> I haven't seen much in the "adv. dope page" on the slide advertising. Personally I think it the most valuable kind since you appeal to the people who are directly interested in what you have to tell them. I have been having a lot of fun with slide ads lately. First, I got my glass blanks and then with a heavy coat of black carriage varnish I made a frame around the edge to close in my reading matter. My official first assistant has a violent artistic sense and in his spare time he concocts some rare specimens in the ornament line. This carriage varnish, when once dry, will stick like a porous plaster, and you can rub off your printing and not harm the frames. For ink I use the following formula:
> Water, 2 oz.
> Mucilage, 1/2 oz.
> White zinc oxide, 1/2 oz.
> When well shaken this makes a dandy slide ink and can be removed by simply rubbing with a moist rag. I generally use ad slides in series of two. For instance, for "A Dumb Wooing," I made out a slide: "Did you ever see a stuttering man try to propose to a girl?" Then I followed this after a second with: "Well, come around to-morrow and see Barry O'More try to tell Mary Fuller that he 'L-l-loves h-h-h-her.'" For the Vita "Red Ink Tragedy," I put on, "John Bunny gets 'murdered' all day Monday at regular prices." This kind of dope I very occasionally put out in the lobby, but I don't believe in the poster bedecked front, and I very rarely use anything there. I find my audiences really interested in this kind of slide advertising instead of groaning at the appearance of an announcement slide, as I have seen happen in some places.
> Running the Columbus reels to-morrow and Tuesday. Have had twenty-seven different newspaper notices on the picture, some clipped from the Selig Press sheet, which, by the way, is an enormous help and ought to be adopted by everybody, and others creatures of my own facile Remington. Am using the one-sheet Selig posters displayed in prominent parts of town. Worked on the school people for several weeks with the result that it was recommended in every class room in the public schools. I have invited a delegation of teachers, principals, and history instructors, and they will attend in a body Monday matinee. I expect a packed house for every performance since the kids have gone home from school and told their parents about the announcement in the class rooms. It was hard work to get the school people to lend their official sanction. I had a run-in with them last week. We were repeating by demand, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and, as it happened to be a rainy day, the schools had one session. Well, the school children almost without exception came down to the theater, and the next day, the principal announced that it was a shame that they could get wet on their way to a theater and yet catch deadly colds if they had to walk in the rain back to school. Still, a good talk with the principals and some of Selig's dope shot at them did the trick, and I hope to break all records with Columbus.
> I see the Vitagraph is going to release "The Lady of the Lake." I wish it were the first of a series of similar classics. I sure could use them.

Looking It Up

If Mr. Wilson will turn to his paper again he will see in the second line of the heading that the film is the first of a series. While he has the file on his desk he might turn back to December 30th, for some more remarks on lantern slides and their making. The suggestions he offers are good, but there are many others. And please note that there is always room for one more.

AIRDOME FOR BROADWAY.

The Broadway Airdome Company has opened an airdome at Broadway and 103rd Street, New York. A fine program of high-class pictures will be run. There will also be good music. The accommodations for patrons will be the best that can be obtained.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

THE FUTURE SCRIPT.

We wish that all of our readers who have not yet read the article by Bannister Merwin on the photoplay of the future in last week's issue would turn to page 805 and read it carefully and then read it again. It was courteously contributed to this department, but it was too good to be cut and too long to print here, and so was run separately.

It was nearly three years ago that Mr. Merwin wrote his first photoplay script; indeed, he was one of the earliest of the first rank of magazine writers to become interested in photoplay. But the time was not yet ripe for the $100 script, and he could not become interested in the smaller sums then paid, and, after a single script, submitted to the Lubin company, he dropped out until he attracted the attention of the Edison studios. Mr. Merwin, who looks beyond the immediate present, and who considers the success of others than himself, has founded a new school of photoplaywriting, and it is not unlikely that he has developed the permanent form of photoplay. The present condensed summary of action has served its purpose well, but it must inevitably be replaced by a more pretentious form. In its present shape the synopsis of action is a mere memorandum for the director, which he fills in as he pleases. Sometimes he regards the directions as the author sees them, but more often his ideas are at variance with those of the creator.

Some authors have sought to contend that dialogue, though not apparent in photoplay, should be used in conjunction with the written "business" to explain the situation clearly; but dialogue has no place in photoplay, and it is both inexpedient and non-essential to memorize a mass of dialogue that serves no useful purpose. The Merwin script does not employ dialogue as such, but conveys the idea through explanation rather than exposition. He does not, for example, write that "John opens the drawer and starts back amazed." Rather he explains that John goes confidently to the desk. He knows that he put the money in the drawer not ten minutes before, and that it must still be there. He throws open the drawer. The money is not there. There is but one explanation. Ruth was the only person in the room beside himself. If the money is not there it must be because she has taken it, yet he must, at all hazzards, shield the woman he loves until she can explain.

This, of course, takes an alarming number of words in comparison to what is now regarded as the standard form, but the style makes for absolute clearness. The actor who plays John is not merely told to look startled. He is told why he is startled. He is given the psychology of the situation, and he is at liberty to interpret it as is most natural to his temperament. He is not hampered by minute stage directions, but he is put in possession of all the essential facts and left to play the scene in accordance with his own ideas and those of his director.

More than this, the director is relieved from the burden of re-creating a play from his own imagination and, in the words of Mr. Merwin, he becomes an interpreter.

Mr. Merwin happily uses the musical simile. Paderewski, for example, has written a most delightful minuet. He is both a composer and a pianist, and his own interpretation of the minuet is a charming performance, but by writing down the musical notation he makes it possible for the school girl pianist to reproduce the composition, not with his facile charm, perhaps, but so that it is understandable and reasonably enjoyable. The better the pianist, the better the interpretation. The more capable and experienced the director, the more finished the photoplay. The director may be like Paderewski, both composer and interpreter, or like de Pachmann, better as an interpreter than a composer.

The Merwin script is not the universal script of to-morrow, or perhaps for many months to come, but eventually the bulk of the photoplays must be written by men who can put their ideas on paper with such clearness that given two directors making the same production, the details will vary no more than does the performance of the same musical composition by two pianists of different temperaments.

Get the Right Addresses.

In sending out scripts, take a little trouble to get the right address. Each company maintains an editorial department and scripts should be sent to the editor at that address. If you know more than the company does about it, don't complain if your scripts are mishandled.

Take the Edison company, for example. Scripts should be sent to the Bedford Park address, where there is a force of clerks to care for the manuscripts. If, instead of taking the trouble to find out the address, you take the Orange address, you pass out of the range of the editorial department, and your scripts go into the hands of clerks used to handling commercial papers. Probably they'll stick a pin through the script and send it over to New York.

Perhaps you've an idea that you can exactly suit the style of G. M. Anderson, of the Essanay company. Possibly you've been told that the office of the editor is in Chicago, but you know lots better than that. You write in a query as to where the Western section is working, and send your story there where there is neither a photoplay department, nor any demand for photoplays. You're lucky if you get your script back because there is no business organization there. A staff of writers prepare all scripts used.

Submit your scripts to the Editor of Photoplays at the address given, and do not try to be clever and get "first hand" to some special director. It does not pay.

Lawrence McCloskey, of the Lubin Company, who, by the way, has gone back to the straight rejection slip, is adding the penned request that all scripts be sent the company, and not individual directors.

Don't Bother Nestor.

Mark the Nestor company as "Not buying." Mr. David Horsley states that he has arranged for a staff of writers to supply the company with photoplays to make the best use of local scenic beauties and that outside photoplays are neither sought nor made welcome.

Some Changes in Address.

The American company has moved up to the fifth floor of the Ashland Block, Chicago, where they can get more space than was available on the Bank floor.

The Bison company has moved across the street from where it was and is now at 1712 Allessandro street, Los Angeles.

The Melies company is now at 334 West Main street, Santa Paula, Cal., instead of at Sulphur Mountain Springs.

Wants to Belong.

The Scenario Magazine is going to adopt photoplay in preference to scenario, but doesn't know quite what to do with its title in such a case. We think that the magazine is heading straight, though the present issue contains rather more reprint than is wise, but we are told that certain plans are in process of completion than will bring out a larger quantity of original matter. It is also said, though not officially, that the subscription price is to be advanced.

Just Because.

Just because you've strung some incidents in more or less regular order from a start to a finish it does not necessarily mean that you have written a photoplay.

That's where so many beginners fall. They keep on writing play after play, but they never sell any, and in the course of time they grow discouraged and stop, convinced that a pull is necessary to make a sale. The only pull that is needed is a strong plot, but the man who gets an idea, hurriedly writes it out and bombards the studios with it, is never going to write that sort of a story.

There never was a story received at a studio that could not be bettered, and very much more than half the output is hopeless because the author was satisfied with the first form.

One of the most common types of story is the elopement. It comes to the studio in every mail and in every shape and form. In its simplest form the story can be reduced to this:

> Joe and Bess love each other, but Bess's father objects to Joe. They elope, and parental forgiveness follows.

That does not seem to be much of a story. Just as a matter of fact, it isn't much of a story, but it's a story that comes into the average studio with such regularity that the editor wonders what happened to it when it does not show up.

It's the sort of story that is written by the author who later writes the papers that the editors ignore his own beautiful subjects while they produce the veriest rot, as he can see night after night at the local theater. After a while he sees a story that may run something like this:

> Joe and Bess are in love with each other, but Bess's father objects to Joe. Joe disguises himself as an English lord and comes to the house. The old man is anxious for a match, but Bess declares that there must be an elopement, so the old man, innocently, helps Joe elope with Bess and is game enough to say "Bless you my children," when the deceit is explained.

That's when six or eight or ten or twenty authors sit down and tell how they sent a story to the Gumph Film Company a year ago. The company kept it four months and returned it with just a printed slip that it was unavailable. Now they have produced it, with some few changes, of course, but very clearly it is the same story, word for word.

And the funniest part of it is that as not more than one in twenty-five records the kick, you multiply the kickers by the quarter hundred to get the total number of aggrieved authors.

Perhaps some other company produces a play that reads like this:

> Joe and Bess love each other, but their parents object. The objection is due to the fact that the two old men are chronic antagonists on all questions, so naturally they cannot agree on this important point. Joe so manipulates things that the old men get into a fight and are arrested by a police captain, friend of Joe's, and locked up, while the lovers get married, stopping at the police station on the way home to explain to the now humble disputants.

That isn't very much like the first story, but it's the first story built up, and so there are some more who cry stop thief, while the original kickers make contented note of the fact that the companies will steal from each other since, of course, this is merely another slight change of their stolen plot.

There are dozens of other variants. Perhaps Joe catches the old man on the roof painting the shingles and takes the ladder away, running away in the auto while the old gentleman tried to make a choice between defeat and a possible broken neck. The two fathers may be on terms of enmity and the father of the girl may assist the elopement to get square with the other, or perhaps Joe marched in the suffragette parade and the mothers helped him to matrimony, as a reward and a lesson to their husbands.

Every one of these is based on the starting plot, and many of these will find a sale where the basic plot would fail. When you get an idea, don't be satisfied with it until you have tried it from all angles, and are satisfied that you can do no better with it. The man who wins a lasting success is the one who takes pains. No inspirational writer who "just dashes off things," ever lasts very long. The hardworking methodical man who does not let go of an idea until he is reasonably certain that he cannot do much better with the material than is on the paper, is the stayer.

The 250 Synopsis.

That 250 word synopsis makes Banquo's ghost look like a sleeping beauty, when it comes to lying down. Now comes C. H. Packer, who says he is a newspaper man, and who, in consequence, should be able to cut to fit. He writes:

> There is one thing, however, that I would respectfully appeal to other scenario writers for their opinion. I do not believe that there is any scenario editor in the business that can judge the strength of a scenario by the reading over of a 250-word synopsis, as now demanded by the larger companies. He positively cannot get the real sense unless he be an editor of very unusual ability. However, I can understand the reason for this limitation, when it is taken into consideration that nearly all the companies are now receiving as high as 500 scenarios a week. I take it that they simply glance over the synopsis and not the scenes, which is the all-important thing in judging the action of a photoplay.
> I am open to conviction on this point and would like to have your honest opinion about it.

We do not appeal to other photoplay writers for their opinion, because they are not entitled to any opinion. The fact stands that certain companies ask that synopses be condensed into 250 words. It is up to the photoplaywright to supply that 250-word synopsis or else send his stuff to other companies that slap the two thousand word synopsis back into the envelope, unread, without any explanation.

Mr. Packer writes that he seldom fails to purchase a copy of this paper, but we think he must have failed to get that copy in which we explained the similarity of the condensed synopsis to the newspaper headline. No editor can judge the strength of a story by the synopsis alone, but he can tell if it is the sort of story he is apt to want and if it is he can read the rest and form his estimate.

If this were merely for Mr. Packer's benefit we would not take all of this space, but Mr. Packer is but one of many who can see no reason for the condensed synopsis, and who will not take it for granted that there must be some good cause. The usual photoplay should make about 5,000 words of short story, and the man who cannot make a synopsis of 5,000 words in 250, doesn't really belong.

But remember this: A synopsis is not a complete transcription. It lists only the important points. Keeping this in mind, and stating only the essential facts, you'll have words to spare out of the 250 allowed.

Is Art Worth While?

Here are a few more remarks from M. F. Burt, of Staten Island:

> May 1st, 1912.—Spent ten cents for Moving Pictures.
> May 2d, 1912.—Glad of it.
> Saw snow scene in photoplay entitled "'Twixt Heaven and Earth."
> Producer ought to receive a pension.
> Simple as a Japanese poster. Action and composition—WELL!
> Looked like an angel's eyeview of cold Creation. No actors in foreground imitating snowflakes preparatory to inter-action.
> Lady next to me said it was "grand." List, you lens collectors—said lady wouldn't know the "MONA LISA" from a sponge, yet simplicity of composition "got her."
> Witnessed production of "Into the Middle of the Waste." Climax expected; appalling simplicity—everywhere subservient to despair expensively painted on actor's face. Actual scene showed a dandy place to camp out. Actor never had a better chance to earn his living. Beat a boarding house a mile. Expression on star's face that of securing votes in popular contest through pity. Expected to hear him say something to add more to scene, but couldn't have heard as interested juvenile back of me kept sucking an orange out loud.
> Producer should have secured copyright from author, added a haystack, and re-named photoplay.

Be Original.

From the number of questions asked about copyright matters, there seems to be a large class of near-authors who think they can write photoplays if they can find ideas ready to hand in non-copyright works or those on which the copyright has expired.

The writer who writes after another is no more an author than is the painter who puts pigment on a traced design. To get a suggestion from some standard or modern work is one thing, but to make an imitation so colorable that there is danger of an infringement suit is quite another, and in the long run there will come discovery and discrediting.

More than that you are losing half the fun of writing. Way down in your heart you know that you're a thief; that you have taken something belonging to another, and have called it your own, and you can't take the same real pride in the story that you could had it all been your very own work.

Why not stop worrying about how long copyright runs, how you may tell if the period has been extended, and all that sort of thing? Instead of worrying about that, worry about an original plot. Instead of planning to use that story you saw in the paper, see if you can't write something wholly different, yet as good. You may get the idea that you can send the script to the studio and get away with it, but unless you find a story no one else ever saw, you'll be one of the many with the same theme.

Some years ago some clever magazine writer told of the experiences of a housekeeping novice with boiled rice. No allowance was made for the fact that rice increases in bulk in cooking. It was a smart little story and the near writers fell upon it with a whoop, each content that no one else would do it. Some forty versions of the theme came into one studio within the first thirty days. Half of these were slavish transcriptions of the story; the rest being improvements that ran all the way from a full kitchen to a house overflowing with rice until it raised the roof. The chances are that copies of those scripts are going around yet, and every time one turns up someone about the place recognizes it as an old friend and points it out to the new editor.

Don't be a thief; be a thinker. It's just as easy in the long run, and much more profitable, and at the same time you do not bring the entire fraternity under suspicion.

That "True" Story.

The other day we read a true story. We know it was a true story because it happened to the person who brought it in. Apart from the fact that it ran pretty nearly ninety scenes and would have put several thousand dollars on the usual cost of a reel, it was not at all interesting except to the person who had gone through the experience.

That's the trouble with almost all of those true stories. They are vivid to the writer because they are actual happenings, but unless you can put your thrill on paper—and it is seldom that you can, it is better to hold to outside plots that you have developed yourself and which are free from the hampering grip of facts.

If you cut your finger badly it is painful and important to you, even though there is no particular danger to be apprehended from a simple cut. To you the story of that cut finger may be the one important thing, but it is bothersome to Jim Jones, who wants to tell about the way he sprained his wrist and who regards your cut finger as interference. Don't write up your cut fingers in opposition to the Jones' sprained wrists. Get a topic that will interest you and Jones and everyone else, and you're more than likely to find that it's something that didn't happen to you or any of your friends.

The "true" story is apt to be a danger signal to the editor who has come to know the signs. It is in the same class with the story written by the young man who is working his way through college, the girl who wants to complete her musical education and some others of that type. Never mind whether or not the story be true so that it is interesting, but the true story seldom interests.

One View of Leader.

In a recent letter a correspondent writes that while confessing lack of technic, she thinks her idea must be about right, as her scenes are all numbered, and a sub-title provided for each scene.

The mistake is a not unnatural one, as some of the companies have almost a passion for overloading their reels with inserts, but it's a good plan to let them commit their own sins and send in your script as clear of leader as possible. A leader, properly used, is not a mark of distinction to lift one scene into greater prominence than another. It is confession that you have something that you cannot convey in action and must put into words. Viewed in this light the script that has a leader for every big scene is not a success.

A New M. P. Graft.

Up to now the get-rich-quick geniuses who have invaded the motion picture business, have stuck to the photoplay writing end as a rule, but now, realizing that there are other thousands who may not care for writing, but who are eager to get in as a player, the acting taught-by-mail has come to the fore, and now the book-taught actor is threatened. One advertisement reads:

> HOW TO BECOME A MOVING PICTURE ACTOR
> Full instruction. A diligent perusal of this work will make a moving picture actor out of any one, lady or gent, professional or amateur. Explains all that you are required to do. How to conduct yourself on your first appearance in studio as if you were an old-timer at the game. Addresses of firms requiring actors and actresses (large salaries are paid). How parlor, kitchen, hallways, interiors, etc., are taken. Sent prepaid on receipt of price, $3.00, anywhere U. S. or Canada.

It is said that the author of the book, who assumes a pen name, is a property man in a photoplay studio, which, of course, qualifies him to teach the art of acting. The information as to how to act like an old-timer on one's first entrance into the studio should be invaluable, and we are quite certain that if we did not already know, we would give up all of the three dollars to discover how hallways and kitchens are taken. With several thousand experienced players only too eager to get a chance to get a position with a picture company, it looks pretty bleak for the gudgeons who purchase this work in the expectation of getting a job

NEW HOUSE AT CHARLESTON, W. VA.

The Hippodrome, Charleston, W. Va., under the management of Stanley A. Platt, opened Monday, May 13, to a large audience, showing two of the latest independent releases, namely, a Nestor and an American. Each guest was presented with a beautiful carnation as souvenir.

Mr. Platt, the proprietor, has spared no expense to make this theater attractive and complete in every detail for the comfort and pleasure of the public. Seating capacity 350, illuminated with the latest improved lights, floor elevated so that every point of the screen can be seen, using the latest improved Edison Underwriters' Model No. 2.

Mr. Geis, of Cincinnati, O., has charge of the piano, Mr. Shubinski, the drums. Mr. Platt expects to show the latest and best independent releases, and will devote his entire time to the management of the Hippodrome. Mr. McMahan, of the Cincinnati Buckeye Film Exchange, selects all of the films for this house, and that alone is a feature which the public of Charleston will appreciate.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

STANDARDIZATION OF PART NAMES.—It would be a considerable advantage if the various manufacturers would get together and standardize the names of machine parts. As the matter now lies, there is an unnecessary amount of confusion created in the operator's mind, and particularly in the mind of the man who is just learning the business of operating, through the fact that various manufacturers apply different names to the same machine part. In the next edition of the hand-book I intend to standardize names of a great many of the parts, regardless of what the various manufacturers may call them. To cite an instance: The Edison Company calls the plate which carries the picture opening, the "picture gauge," whereas I believe all the other companies call it an aperture plate. The Motiograph people apply the name "arbor" to a shaft, or spindle. Arbor is a perfectly proper name, as far as that goes, but it is not the name the other manufacturers use, and, moreover, shaft or spindle is the name ordinarily used for such a part. The Motiograph people have, at my suggestion, kindly consented to substitute the word shaft and spindle for the term arbor; also to make other similar changes. The Standard people also agreed to some changes, as did the Powers and Edison companies, and I believe this will prove of considerable benefit.

There are also some rather foolish names used, such as "star wheel." What in the world is the sense in tacking the word "wheel" onto star? A star is not a "wheel" in any sense of the word. It does not travel around continuously. It is, in fact, even more of a maltese cross than it is a star, but the word star is nevertheless appropriate. It is also sufficient, therefore why add the superfluous word "wheel" to it. Many of the manufacturers use the term "film gate." Might I inquire why the "film" part of it is attached? Gate is sufficient. It is simpler. It is better. Some manufacturers use the term film sprocket. The film part of the word is superfluous and unnecessary. Sprocket serves the purpose as well or even better. But, regardless of all this, the same part should bear the same name, regardless of what particular brand of mechanism it belongs to. The aperture plate should be an aperture plate, not an aperture plate—picture gauge—picture mask, all of which terms are used in this country. The Edison Company was the pioneer manufacturer, and doubtless feels that the terms originally selected by it should have been adopted—which is true. They were not, in some instances, however, and that corporation should gracefully yield the point and move along with the crowd.

GOOD PROJECTION.—Ottumwa, Iowa, writes: "Allow me to call your attention to the fact that we do not live in the backwoods, as a brother intimated who recently informed you of the fact that we think a lot of the Projection Department out here. This is nearly the center of these United States, and there is not so much timber around here either. An old-time operator, who is now agent for the mirror screen, was here recently, and tells us that our projection is better than any he has seen elsewhere. And he has traveled through Baltimore, Chicago, and New York, and many other cities. I think that is saying considerable for Ottumwa. I attach hereto a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, No. 534, I. A. T. S. E., which has eleven members in good standing."

I don't think the brother really meant to intimate that Ottumwa was in the "backwoods." He used the expression rather as a (as David Harum would say) figure of speech. For your information, allow me to say, I lived in Ottumwa all of one summer, stopping at a little hotel on Green street, near the Wabash railroad tracks; 1886 I think that was, and I can vouch for the fact that there are no backwoods connected with your city. I am pleased indeed to have such an excellent report of Ottumwa projection. Let your motto be improvement and never be satisfied with results so long as they can in any way be bettered.

WRONG MEASUREMENT.—Ashland, Wis., writes: "There is one thing in particular which seems to trouble many of the brothers, viz: 'Ghost.' In nearly every case you have advised trying different focal length condensers until the said Ghost disappears. This treatment has met success in some cases, and in some it has not. I agree with you that the trouble lies in the condensers. There are too few condensing lenses which come anywhere near being the focal length they are supposed to be. For this reason many are unable to eliminate the trouble. I have a lens measure such as is used by opticians. I find that the so-called 7½-inch condensers very seldom really measure more than 7 inches, and in most cases 6⅞, except in the high-grade lenses, which cost $1.50 to $2.00 each. In the cheaper lenses there is from ¾ to ½-inch variation, which means a great deal when one is trying to get rid of a ghost by following directions. I have also noticed, from time to time, operators speaking of projecting brilliant pictures with only 30 amperes A. C., claiming, in some instances, the picture to be 17 feet wide. Evidently, those consuming but 30 amperes, and claiming to get a bright picture therewith, have never seen what I would call a well illuminated picture. In my estimation it takes from 65 to 70 amperes, regardless of distance, but confining ourselves to a cloth curtain. Were they using D. C., that would be a horse of an entirely different color."

I thoroughly agree with what the brother has said as concerning the lack of reliability of condenser measurement, and would advise the operator to measure his own lenses every time. I cannot agree that the ghost trouble always lies in the condenser focal length though, since, I believe the spacing of the condensers very often has something to do with it also; and there may be other things, too, one very serious fault being excessive spherical aberration. However, in general the brother is correct and, in a majority of cases the first thing to do is to try changing the focal length of the condensers. I thoroughly agree that the projection of a brilliant picture, 17 feet wide, would be an absolute and total impossibility with 30 amperes. I will go the brother one better, and say that a brilliant illumination of a 17-foot picture could not be had with less than 80 amperes, though a very good illumination could be had with 65, or 70. As the brother intimates, a great deal depends on what one considers "brilliant." The operating room transformers, such as the Compensarc, Inductor and Economizer, are limited to 60 amperes secondary output, which ought to limit the picture size to about 15 feet, since a really good illumination can hardly be had with 60 amperes A. C., if that size is exceeded, provided an ordinary curtain be used, of course. With a mirror screen, and even with some of the other patent screens, an 18-foot picture can be brilliantly illuminated with 60 amperes A. C.

DISAPPOINTED, BUT.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed), writes: "Received your hand-book. At first I was disappointed because of its size, but what it lacks in that respect, it certainly more than makes up in quality, and no operator should be without one. However, in your list of tools you overlooked the hack-saw. Would you kindly give all the information possible as to organizing a local of the I. A. T. S. E.? When do you continue the photographic instructions on machines? When you have completed the series, please put up the entire thing in a neat book, as a second edition to the hand-book. This would be much more convenient to the operator than in its present form. If such a thing is possible, it would be even more valuable to the operator than the hand-book itself, and the two would make a complete operator's library.

I can assure the brother that the matter will be in book form, and it will be a book that will make you all sit up and take decided notice, too, when it is finished, which I expect will be about September first. Your comment on the omission of the hack-saw is pertinent, and I thank you for it. The hack-saw is a valuable tool to the operator. As to information concerning the organization, address Mr. Lee M. Hart, general secretary-treasurer, I. A. T. S. E., State Hotel, State and Harrison streets, Chicago, Ill. It was not my intention to make a book that you would have to have a wheelbarrow to carry around. There are plenty of that kind of books on the market now. I am glad you found the contents of the hand-book to compensate for its lack of volume. The one great fault of instruction books is that their authors use too many words. They try to make a big book, and in order to accomplish that they pad it out with a multiplicity of words, until the thing becomes of little or no value. I, on the other hand, in my books, try to eliminate every word I can, and keep the thing as concise and simple as possible, and I believe I may say my way of doing it has met with general approval.

POWERS SIX GRINDS.—"My new Powers No. 6 grinds hard when the framing device is in its middle position; in fact, there is but an inch or so of the swing at either end of the framing where the grind is not noticed. It is impossible to use a framing device of this condition. Will you please advise me how to remedy the difficulty?"

The trouble, in all probability, lies in the toggle gear. Referring to the issue of January 6th, which I presume of course you have on file, I think you will find that connecting link, 682, P 7, is loose in its ways, thus allowing toggle gear, 678, P 7, the spindle, 679, P 7, of which fits in hole 742, P 7, to wobble, and be out of line with gear 680, P 5, and the flywheel pinion. If this is the fact, tighten screws 745, P 7. If connecting link 682, P 7, still is loose, then loosen screws 745, P 7, again, and tighten setscrews (2 of them), 744, P 7, slightly. Re-tighten screws 745, after having set set-screws 744, just so that the framing lever begins to work the least little bit hard, and try the machine. Very likely the grind will have been lessened. CAUTION: If you get screws 744 too tight, when you tighten up screw 745, the framing carriage will stick fast. If this does not stop the trouble, then try placing a piece of hard wood against the casting which holds connecting link 682 (the casting attached to the frame, I mean), on the front side and strike it a sharp (but not too hard) blow with a hammer. If this remedies the matter, all right. If it makes it worse, then try tapping the casting on the other side. If none of these things remedy the matter, then I am afraid you will have to send the machine to the factory.

PATENT SCREEN.—The editor is in receipt of a large number of inquiries regarding a "Radiant Vellum Screen," presumably manufactured by Williams, Brown and Earle, Philadelphia, Pa.

Not having received any information concerning this screen, or not having seen one of them in operation, we are unable to offer any information, or advice concerning the same.

MACHINE TROUBLE.—Jack Miller, Sioux City, Iowa, sends in a number of patches from the film of a certain manufacturer, commenting on the poor cement used, and writes: "Am running an Edison Model B outside shutter, series No. 2282. Have been compelled to remove the outside shutter and install an inside one, due to the awful grinding noise. I changed the gears, shaft and bearings, and it would run like a top until the shutter was replaced, then the grind began again."

The patches have been forwarded to the manufacturer. As to the grinding, I think it is due to one of the old style shutter bearings, which were not altogether satisfactory. The new style of bearing was put in as soon as the trouble was discovered, and it has, the Edison Company informs me, entirely overcome the same. I think if you will procure one of these new bearings, you can re-install your outside shutter and will find no further difficulty.

THE ONLY ONE.—Erie, Pa., writes: "The operator at the Happy Hour Theater, Erie, Pa., has the distinction of being the only Union operator in that city, he being a member of Cleveland, Ohio, Local No. 160, I. A. T. S. E. The Happy Hour Theater runs Independent film. When Mr. Colen took charge of the operating room, certain machine troubles were present, which the retiring operator had been unable to eliminate. Mr. Colen straightened matters out in short order. The inference from this is that the Union operator is the better man, and better able to give value in return for his salary. The house runs pictures and vaudeville during the week, and straight pictures on Sundays. The machine is motor driven. The house had a seating capacity of 1,200 on one floor. Throw is about 150 feet. The Queen City Amusement Co. is owner and the theater has a splendid patronage."

Yes, the inference is that the Union man is the better posted man. He should be, because he has had the benefit of meeting with his fellow operators and discussing matters pertaining to his profession, which is a distinct advantage and one not ordinarily possessed by the non-union operator. Erie operators, assuming that there are enough of them to do so, will do well to perfect an organization, and such an organization should be received by the managers in a friendly spirit, since in the long run, it will be to their own benefit. It is quite true that the perfection of an organization might mean an increase in salaries. If it also means an increase in knowledge and efficiency, as it certainly ought to, then the managers will gain, out of proportion to any possible increase in wages demanded. It takes a very little imperfection on the screen to deduct five, ten, or even twenty dollars if the house be a large one, from the weekly box office receipts. Conversely it takes but a little added perfection in projection to add five or more dollars to the weekly box office receipts; hence it follows that the manager can well afford to pay an advanced price for a better operator, and it stands to reason that the Union operator who has the advantage of associating with his fellow craftsmen, and who is enterprising enough to seek to better his own condition in a business-like way, through perfection of an organization, will be a better man and produce better results, than he who has not these advantages, and who is not enterprising enough to seek the betterment of his own condition.

LIGHT TROUBLE.—Portland, Ore., writes: "I take a great interest in the department. Have been operating almost three years, using D. C. all the time. I am now in a suburban theater, using 110 volt, A. C., and do not get a good light. I pull 25 amperes through a choke coil. The wires in the operating room have been in use almost two years. Should they be changed? The light is bright for a few moments, and then gets brown. Have examined all connections, carbon jaws and tried different carbon settings, but it seems to be no good. Which is the better, a choke coil or a rheostat? I am using two 6½ condensers which have been in the machine for a long time, and the throw is 50 feet, and there is no ghost, but the light is brown all over. Once in a while, however, it is good. After the arc has been on for a while, the fuses outside of the operating room get real hot. Connections are clean and tight. Where is the trouble?"

In the first place, Portland, you can hardly expect to get anything else but a brown light, using 25 amperes of A. C. You have not said what size your picture is, in any event, you should not use less than 40 amperes of A. C., and if your picture is more than 12 feet wide, I advise the use of from 50 to 60 amperes. If your picture exceeds 15 feet in width, then I advise the use of from 60 to 80 amperes, according to the size of the picture. As to the choke coil: I have seen coils which produce very good light; I have also seen coils which produce very poor light indeed. Not knowing what make your coil is, I could not comment upon its efficiency. If you have a hand-book, and you by all means should have one (price $1.50 from the Moving Picture World), you will find the matter of A. C. carbon setting described and illustrated on pages 86 to 91, inclusive. If those fuses get warm, then it is evident that they are too small. Put in fuses a little larger. If your wires get warm after the arc has been burning for a time, then they are too small, or have deteriorated from use, and they should be replaced. If they do not get warm, then they are all right. I think the cause of your trouble is due to the lack of sufficient amperage. The choke coil will, if I rightly remember, pass more current when cold than after it warms up, which would account for your brighter light for a minute or two. Also if your fuses and wires get warm that would add resistance tending to reduce amperage as the temperature mounts.

LIGHT TROUBLE.—Columbus, Ohio, writes: "I have a Standard machine and am using 30 amperes of 110 volt, A. C., on a 16-foot picture. At 60 feet cannot get a clear field. The light is bright in the center and dim around the margin. Have moved the lamphouse back and forward, but to no purpose. Have cleaned all electrical connections and it has made but slight difference, though some."

I must say to you as I said to Portland, Ore., that you are not using current enough. With a 16-foot picture, assuming that you have an ordinary screen, you should have at the very least calculation, 60 amperes of A. C., and 70 would be much better. You might possibly improve matters somewhat by changing your condensers. You have a 3½-inch E. F. projection lens, provided your picture is 16 feet wide, and should have either two 6½ condensing lenses, or one 6½ and one 7½. But you can take it from me that your curtain illumination will not be at all good, until you use more current, though, as I said, you may improve it somewhat by changing your condenser lenses—and you may not.

INFORMATION WANTED.—Monson, Mass., asks for a line on working conditions in and around Colorado, especially Denver. Says he would like to locate out there on account of his health. He is a member of Local 186, Springfield, and has had seven years of experience.

I am unable to reply postively to the brother's inquiry, but from my own knowledge and experience, however (I lived in Colorado for several years and am thoroughly acquainted with all of its cities, including Denver), I must say that the woods are literally full of men, who have gone to that climate on account of their health. This operates to congest the labor market very badly all the time. If some of the Denver brothers will supply the desired information, we will be glad to give it publicity for the benefit of Monson and others. Monson also might write the Denver Local for information, addressing Secretary Denver Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, Box 302.

EDITOR CORRECTED.—Kewanee, Ill., writes: "Was sorry to see you fall down on the stunt mentioned by La Crosse in a recent issue of the department. The matter referred to was the making of figures to move backward on the screen, and still be right side up. When I worked in Chicago three years ago, I occasionally did that when I felt like 'monkeying.' It is troublesome to run a film through the machine backward, because you have to wind it up on the upper reel by hand while running the machine; also wind the film off the take-up, as it unwinds too fast if you leave the belt on. However, this stunt can only be performed, so far I know, on a finger feed machine."

Another brother from Denver, Colo., writes, saying that the film may be run backward through the machine by slipping off the take-up belt, and rewinding the top reel by hand. "This stunt can be done on an Edison. Using a fire scene I had great sport in running the film the right way and then reversing, and having the firemen carry the rescued people back into the flames."

Still another brother from Oskaloosa, Iowa, hands it thusly:

"I am a constant and interested reader of your department. I have never bothered you with any fool questions or any of my troubles of any sort, and probably would not have done so now, if you had not come down so flat-footed on 'Back Up,' LaCrosse, Wis. I am one state nearer Missouri than he is and I want to be 'shown,' just as bad or a little worse than he does. About three years ago, I saw a man advertising the Southern Pacific Railroad, showing some moving pictures and slides in a church. He showed one of the old stock films, which has been in the catalogue of every dealer in supplies for the road shows ever since the motion picture was thought of. This film shows men in bathing suits diving from a high platform into the water. After running his film, or a part of it, the lecturer, who was also the operator, said he would now satisfy the curiosity of those who wondered how the men got back onto the platform. He then simply turned the crank of his machine backward and the action on the screen was reversed, the men coming out of the water, feet first, and landed on the platform standing, as they had started. At that time, I did not know as much about the moving picture machine as I do now, and I don't know enough yet about one to dare to try the experiment of turning it backward. The only plausable explanation I have for this phenomenon is that possibly this man had one of the older and simpler makes of machines, which would run just as well backward as forward. I do not know that this is any explanation at all, but I'd like you to give me a better one than you did 'LaCrosse,' for I'll tell you I was not 'asleep and peacefully dreaming' when I saw this. I was very wide awake, as I can prove by a certain young lady, in whom I was much interested at that time, and am yet for that matter.

"This lady sat by my side that night, she's been by my side much of the time since. In fact, I distinctly remember that we stood up in that same church sometime after this incident mentioned and that she promised to continue in that close relation to me until death should come between us. I mention these happy incidents simply to prove that I was not 'asleep and peacefully dreaming;' we were both interested in the moving picture game, which was new to us at that time, and we went to this exhibition to study the scientific side of it. We got seats as close as possible to the machine, which was located in the center of the room. We both distinctly saw the crank turned backward and the picture reversed on the screen. We spoke of it at the time and have discussed it since. I hope that I shall not get the same positive explanation—?—you gave La Crosse, as it hurts to be forced to lose confidence in a man for whom I have always had the highest esteem. I like your answer to 'Canton, Ohio,' on the next page of the same issue, much better."

The editor stands corrected, and hereby tenders his apology, to La Crosse. I have in my sanctum sanctorum an Edison, Type B, an Exhibition Model, a Standard No. 4, and a Powers Six mechanism. Now, when I answered La Crosse I knew positively that the Powers Six would not run the film backward at all, and I did not see any reason for believing that the film could entirely by its own stiffness, push its way up against the pressure of the tension springs, except possibly in the case of the Standard machine, in which the film is practically confined, and cannot very well buckle at any point. Experiments, however, show that the Edison machine will run the film backward, though the one I have, will not make two turns of the crank without buckling the film just above the intermittent sprocket. The Powers Six will not run it backwards at all. The Motiograph which I have here will not run the film backwards at all, and the Edison Exhibition Model acts about the same as the Model B in this respect; while the Standard machine apparently runs the film backward as well as the other way, all of which demonstrates that there are none of us who are so smart that they have nothing to learn. I have learned something, and therefore thank La Crosse for having brought the matter up, and he has my apologies for the error in which I fell in replying to his communication. I want to add, however, that the evidence Oskaloosa presents to prove that he was not asleep and peacefully dreaming would, it seems to me, tend to prove exactly the reverse. How about that proposition, Mrs. Oskaloosa?

MORE TROUBLE.—Walters, Okla., mentions the valuable information he has received from the medium of the department, and then proceeds as follows: "I have a Powers Six and Fort Wayne compensarc. Am using 110-volt current on a 60-foot throw, with a 13-foot picture. My screen is my own manufacture. I sized the cloth and then lacquered it and dusted on common gold bronze. I gave it five coats this way, and at 60 feet I had a clear cut and bright picture, true to life as any one would wish to look at, using from 40 to 50 amperes A. C. Have changed my building and now have an 80-foot throw with a 12-foot picture, same screen. My lens is a French lens and supposed to be a good one; am using 60 amperes and still cannot get as good a clear-cut and bright picture as I had on the 60-foot throw. My condensing lenses are not more than ⅛ of an inch apart. It seems the picture is a little bit out of focus, or doesn't come out as bright and nice as it used to. I projected the very first moving picture that was ever shown in Milwaukee, Wis., with the Edison Vitascope machine, in the Academy of Music. Mr. Webster was the manager. This was 16 years ago, and yet almost every day I learn something new."

If you had a 13-foot picture at 60 feet, then with the same lens at 82 feet, you would have a very much larger picture. If you have changed the lenses, as you surely must have done, then apparently the new lens is not as good as the old. Are you sure that the surfaces of all the parts of your projection lens are perfectly clean, both inside and out? You say you dusted your screen with "gold" bronze. Surely you mean silver or aluminum? You do not mean the yellowish gold bronze, do you? I will have to ask you to be a little more definite Walters, before I can offer anything further in the way of advice. One other thing is possible, however, viz: That you have increased the length of the lens barrel, thus moving the lens combinations further apart. If so you cannot expect very good results from a lens treated in that way.

INFORMATION WANTED.—Taunton, Mass., writes: "Will you kindly tell me all about rheostats; how to operate them, also how to make calculations in finding out how many coils must be cut out to produce a certain number of amperes. I thank you in advance, and trust you will answer as soon as possible."

Taunton, you don't ask for much, do you? In order to reply to your query, I would have to consume the entire department space, and then some! I suggest that you send $1.50 for the hand-book, in which such matters are treated with tolerably complete detail. That would be the most practical way to obtain the most desired information, as well as the cheapest way.

CONDENSERS.—Wilmington, N. C., writes: "What size condenser should I use for a picture 15 feet 4 inches by 11 feet 4 inches, and throw 64 feet?"

You have a 4-inch E. F. projection lens. Try two 6½ and one 6½ and one 7½, using whichever combination gives the best results.

LIGHT TROUBLE.—Clear Lake, Iowa, writes: "My goat is got. Am having trouble with my light. Take current through a 110 volt, 60 cycle, 2 K. W., Fort Wayne compensarc. When the same is set at 40 amperes, am able to get a steady light, and crater seems to be O. K., but when I switch over to the 60 ampere contact, I am unable to hold the light steady. About every two minutes the arc flames and flares up. I watch the carbons very closely and have tried several different sets. The crater will not form good. Use ⅝ cored electra carbons. The operator using this compensarc before I did experienced the same trouble. I had one of your hand-books, but some one swiped it. However, I was not long in ordering another. Have had five years' experience as a manager and operator, but have never encountered the trouble described until now. What size condensers should I use for a 14-foot picture, 60-foot throw, Motiograph machine? An operator tried to tell me that good condensers are not clear or white, but have a greenish tint. I say the whiter the better. Am I correct? He also says it does not pay to put in time patching films before they are shown. Says that bad patches will pull in two during the first show, and then you can fix them up. He has had two whole years' experience, and knows about all there is to know. Bright student, huh? We have a house seating 700, and try to show the best pictures in the best way. I do my own operating, therefore know it is done right. Don't know it all, never expect to. No kids go here. My operating room is large and fireproof. Have a perforated water-pipe around the top of the room, into which the water can be turned, either from the inside or the outside of the room, as there are two pipes connecting. The water is under a pressure of 45 pounds. Inside of the room is lined with galvanized iron and all openings have automatic shutters."

It is somewhat difficult to say with certainty just what is wrong, but I think you will find that your compensarc is delivering considerably more than its rated capacity. This may be due to its being wound for a somewhat lower voltage than it is being used on. Possibly your current, instead of being 110 is 120 or 125. The thing to do is to have the power house people test your amperage by connecting an ammeter in on the secondary and seeing what the actual delivery is. I think you will find it considerably above 60, and 60 is about the limit for a ⅝ cored carbon. If I am right, then you can stop your trouble by changing your compensarc to one wound for your voltage, or by using ¾ cored carbon, instead of ⅝. As to the condensers: You have about a 4-inch projection lens, and either two 7½ or one 6½ and one 7½ might give the best results. Try both and see. As to the remarks of your operator friend, I presume he knows too much for me to try to tell him anything, but for your own benefit I will say that any tint of color, green or otherwise, in a condenser, is evidence of poor quality. The perforated pipe stunt is all right, as far as it goes, but when a reel of film catches fire, that particular reel is going to burn, regardless of what you may do to stop it. The thing to do is: Install an ample vent pipe from the ceiling of the operating room to the open air, and wall shutters, which will instantly close. Instantly, I said, mind you—when a fire starts. Coupled with fireproof walls this combination is the best protection; in fact, the only protection there is. You must remember that it is not the fire that injures an audience, but the panic which starts the instant a wisp of smoke or flame is seen. It is a childishly simple proposition to so construct and equip an operating room that a fire could occur at any time without the audience ever having the slightest inkling of its presence in the building. The crass stupidity of the authorities in dealing with this matter is nothing short of astounding. They seem to require everything but the right thing, and carefully dodge all around that. Once and for all, let me say that true fire protection in a moving picture theater hinges on three things, viz: (a) Thoroughly fireproof walls. (b) A vent pipe to the open air of sufficient size to carry off all smoke and flame. (c) Shutters which will close the instant the fire starts and before the flame is to exceed one foot in length. I intend in the new edition of the hand-book, which will be due about September 1st, to set this matter forth fully, and in detail, with illustrations so that any manager can equip his operating room in compliance with the above conditions. Having so done, he need have no fear of a fire panic in his theater.

A ROAST.—New York City writes a lengthy letter, in which he comments caustically upon New York operators. Among other things he speaks of the amount of hot air emanating from certain individuals. He also comments caustically on the personal appearances of quite a large percentage of New York operators, and says that half of them cannot speak the English language correctly. He continues: "I know of a few New York operators who look like gentlemen, and who know something about their business, and are still studying diligently to improve their knowledge and work. When a manager hires an operator, he will not pay a good price for a fellow who has all the appearance of a 'dope.' He also acquires the ideas that if such 'rummies' as some of the New York men appear to be, and also appear rather proud of being, it does not take much brains to be an operator, therefore the really good men do not get the credit they should for the knowledge they have acquired through years of study. I believe it would be a good idea if all the moving picture employees, including the piano players, singers, etc., would organize in one union, the examination to which should be a rigid one."

It must be admitted that there is a great deal in what the brother says. There is a considerable percentage of the New York men who seem to take little or no pride in their work, their personal appearances, manners or anything else, and at the same time imagine themselves to be "lady-killers." I will heartily agree with the brother that this type of an operator is no credit to himself, or to the profession. I will also agree with him that not only is he no credit to the profession, but he is a distinct discredit to it, and undoubtedly the impression you set forth is to some extent conveyed by them to the managers. However, if you mean by "not speaking the English language correctly," that many of the boys are foreigners, then I must disagree with you, since I am not a believer in that kind of distinction. I don't care where a man comes from, or who his ancestors were. He may be an Italian, a Russian, a Frenchman, a German, or anything else. I don't care as long as he is a man. I don't hold his nationality against him in the least, and I have a whole lot more respect for the foreigner who behaves himself and acts like a man, than I have for some Americans whose chief object in life seems to be to see how closely they can imitate the striped animal whose chief weapon of defense is the exact opposite of perfume. The suggestion you make as regards one organization is hardly worth discussing at this time. Theoretically, you are correct. Practically, however, the present form of organization is the one which will obtain, so what is the use in wasting space arguing something which though desirable, is not within our reach.

DUTY.—Homeworth, Ohio, writes: "Can you tell me what the duty per foot is on film; also can the duty be paid, on arrival at destination, through express companies? For instance: I am buying several reels of used film in Germany. How can I arrange to pay duty, etc.?"

I am not positive as to the exact rate of duty, but to the best of my recollection, it is 25 per cent. ad valorem. You can arrange with the express company to bring the films to Homeworth in bond; you paying the duty there. A recent U. S. law places exposed film in the category of photographs.

CANADA.—(Name of town suppressed) sends in a copy of the regulations for moving picture machines, film exchanges, etc., which same have just been adopted. The brother also comments on the six-months' law, which he considers highly undesirable as applied to operators and then springs the following proposition: "I think it would be a good thing if a law were passed (union, I suppose the brother means, of course) to compel apprentices to serve two years before being given a working card. What kind of a profession is Operating anyhow, if anyone can get a card at the end of six months' service? What other trade, or profession would consider a man as being proficient at the end of six months' apprenticeship? Would a card be given to a plumber, carpenter, brick-layer, electrician, engineer, or in fact, any other trade or profession, at the end of six months? Well, I should hope not! No one would for a moment assume that an apprentice would be a competent workman at any of the before mentioned trades in that period of time. I, for one, claim that to learn operating right is as much of a task as it is to learn any one of the before mentioned trades. Then why, may I ask, should a man be required to only serve six months? It looks to me as though the profession was being held rather cheaply when a man can qualify as an operator in half a year. If we want better projection, better pay, better conditions, let us set the example ourselves by putting the business on a higher plane. We cannot reasonably expect the authorities to enact better, or stricter laws, since we ourselves set a little better example."

To all and sundry of which the editor very heartily agrees. It is ridiculous, and highly absurd to suppose that a man can learn the profession of operating in six months' time. The remarks of the brother as applied to the brick-layer, carpenter, etc., are highly pertinent. Why, a man would hardly be advanced to the position of section boss in six months. He would not be expected to know enough about the business of tamping ties, etc., in that time, and yet the operator apprentice expects in that brief period to master a considerable portion of the subject of optics, the mechanism of the moving picture machine, the action of an arc light, resistance, transformers, and acquire a working knowledge of electrics. Wonderful indeed must be the stock from which operators are made when they can do this.

Perhaps, after all they don't do it. In fact, judging by results on the screen, I guess they really don't. The change from six months (and I am afraid some of them only really serve about one of the six, to two years would be something of a jolt; nevertheless the change should be made. This is a very live subject and its injection at this time is pertinent; particularly in view of the coming convention. I would be glad to have the views of our readers as regards the matter.

As regards the law: I note that it seems to be largely complied with the idea of extracting money from the moving picture people. There is a fee demanded for about everything that one could possibly be tacked onto. The poor operator is soaked for $5.00, for which, so far as I can see, he gets absolutely nothing in return; not even being protected by an examination. We would humbly suggest that the officials of the Province of Ontario buy a few masks and bludgeons and go out and do the job right. The law contains a lot of provisions about "automatic cut offs" for the wall openings of the operating "cabinet," (cabinet is better than "booth" anyhow), but these provisions are merely a joke, since there is no description, detailed or otherwise, setting forth what these automatic arrangements shall consist of. Clause 6 relates that every operator should be of the full age of 18 years. He shall examine his machine and lamp connections; he will and must devote his whole attention to the machine while operating. Piffle! The regulation is all right, there is nothing wrong with it, but why waste all that ink? If an 18 year old boy has the legal right to operate, it will not strain anything very much for the 16 year old kid to become 18 by the process of saying so. The whole law is about as poor an example of governmental effort as we have viewed to date, and when our Canadian brothers beat us at the job of making fool laws they are certainly traveling some.

"THE BREAKDOWN" (Imp).

"The Breakdown" is a story of Wall Street and Hot Springs. Wall Street men break down for one of two reasons: they either make too much money and become physically distraught by the cares and burdens of their success, or they break up and so break down. Which is a paradox, but also the truth. For when a man breaks up in business he not infrequently breaks down in health.

The particular breakdown in health of the hero of the Imp drama was caused by the circumstances that he, the president of a great downtown company, had to find a large sum of money by a certain hour on a certain day in order to save his company from collapse. The clamor of failure already beat about his ears and the poor fellow physically collapsed. In the emergency a scheme occurred to himself and his fellow directors whereby the situation might be saved by time and other expedients. The stricken president had a "double" and that "double" was made to take the place of the president in the Wall Street office, whilst the latter went down to Hot Springs to recuperate.

Scene from "The Breakdown" (Imp).

He arrived at the Springs a physical wreck, was rejuvenated and, meeting there one or two eminent financiers, obtained their support for his company and got back to Wall Street on the stroke of the important hour with a check for half a million dollars in his pocket, which saved the fortunes of his company.

Meanwhile, his "double" had been an ideal president. Nevertheless, he was so human that, when the real president returned, he discovered his "double" having a corking good time in the seductive society of woman and wine.

This interesting drama gives King Baggot a unique opportunity of playing opposite himself. The Wall Street scenes, and the scenes at Hot Springs, and the exciting return of the president, racing from the Grand Central Station to Wall Street against time with a check for half a million dollars in his pocket, supply innumerable thrills for the really excellent picture. June 3rd is the release date.

S. M. HEXTER VISITS NEW YORK.

S. M. Hexter, of the Gordon Realty Co., owners of the "Penn Square" and "Gordon Square" theaters, Cleveland, Ohio, was a caller at the Moving Picture World office in New York during the week. The Gordon Square is a new house, thoroughly fireproof, and seating 1,400. It represents an investment of $60,000. Pictures and vaudeville are shown, and the policy of the house is to raise the standard of the exhibition business in Cleveland to the highest plane. Mr. Harry Du Rocher is the resident manager.

"WESTERN HEARTS" (Essanay).

This is another gripping, virile Western drama enacted in the heart of the sage-brush country by G. M. Anderson and the Essanay Western-stock company. The plot is vital, original and striking.

Seth Perkins, an old prospector, has two daughters, Mabel and Vedah. Vedah is a cripple and is forced to use a crutch. The town doctor informs Perkins an operation is necessary to cure her and the expense will be one hundred dollars. Knowing her father hasn't the money, Vedah bravely determines to save it herself. She and Mabel have a garden and sell the produce to the storekeeper. Mabel is vain and demands to be paid in material for dresses, ribbons, etc., while Vedah takes money as her share and hoards it carefully. Sam Hard, a young puncher, loves Mabel, and it tears Vedah's heart to see her sister so happy while she is miserable. One day a note is shoved over the sheriff's door advising that Sam is running a still in Coyote Cave. A posse raids the cave and Sam is captured. He is led manacled past Perkin's shack and is allowed to speak to Mabel, who loftily declines to wait until he is released and returns his ring. Sam is led away and Vedah remonstrates with her sister for her cruelty and learns that Sam will either have to serve his jail sentence or pay a fine of one hundred dollars. Making the greatest sacrifice of her life, Vedah bravely takes the money she has saved, secures Sam's release and he awakens to his true love, asks her to become his wife and the world smiles brightly again.

Scene from "Western Hearts" (Essanay).

Mr. Anderson, as usual, is sturdy and satisfying in the role of Sam, and Vedah Bertram imbues the character of "Vedah" with tenderness and self-sacrifice that is the perfection of beautiful pathos.

Taken under the brilliant sunlight of California, the photographic quality of the production is well-nigh perfect, and is a rare treat in clean-cut, clear, snappy values. The release date is June 15th.

"THE PASSING SHADOW."

This is one of the Essanay heart-interest dramas and is announced for release June 14th. The plot is strikingly novel, and features Francis X. Bushman in one of the greatest roles this popular favorite has ever portrayed for his countless admirers.

"Frisco" Sam, a tramp, is brutally kicked out of a farmhouse yard one morning when he attempts to get a drink of water. Swearing vengeance he limps off down the road and meets a little crippled girl who wistfully gives him a luscious apple. Thanking her with a grim smile, he goes on to his camp and, while looking over an old newspaper, finds that his wealthy father has died and the lawyers are trying to locate him. Beating his way to the city he proves his identity and finds a fortune of fifty thousand dollars has been left him. Possessed with but the one thought of revenge on the rustics who mistreated him, Parsons begins to lay his plans.

Meanwhile Farmer Rankin is advised that he will have to send his little daughter to the city for an operation to cure her deformity. Not having the necessary money, Rankin is in despair, but is absolutely crushed on receiving a letter from his lawyer advising that his mortgage has been taken over by a New Yorker who threatens eviction unless payment is made next day noon. Of course Parsons is the new owner and, on arriving, refuses to listen to any pleas of mercy until he finally comes across the little crippled child, and recognizes her as the angel who gave him the apple in his distress. A moment only he struggles with himself, then tiptoes from the room with her fairy book in his hand, writes a check to cover the operation expense and pins it, together with the surrendered mortgage, to a leaf in the book, lays it in the hands of the sleeping tot, silently kisses one of the tangled curls and steals away.

Scene from "The Passing Shadow" (Essanay).

The Essanay Company have made a masterpiece production of this charming story. Mr. Bushman is splendid as "Frisco" Sam, and little Eleanor Kahn, one of the most finished child-actresses in the country, will moisten many an eye in her characterization of the little cripple.

The photography throughout is rich in beautiful tone values.

"THE RUSTIC MAID" (Eclair).

A little lesson to proud young ladies is tucked away in this pretty Eclair offering. Apart from the story interest the picture should of especial interest to exhibitors and others because it contains the first appearance of Miss Barbara Tennant as an Eclair leading lady. This is also her first appearance in a moving picture of any kind, and the competent way in which she does her work is well worth noticing.

The moral of this picture is more than obvious. It goes to show that real worth and personal merit will win in the long run over deceiving appearances and self-delusion. Miss Tennant plays the part of the rustic maid with much skill and grace. It seems that a society mother is having trouble with her two marriageable daughters. They are so proud and have such lofty ideas that they are in danger of becoming fine old maids. The eligible young men of the town are frightened away by the airs they put on. The mother of the girls makes up her mind to teach them a lesson. There is a young lady friend of hers returning from Europe; a very pretty and charming miss. It is to her that the mother appeals and proposes her plan. The plan is that the young lady come and visit her in the garb of a rustic maid. The only instructions she gets as to her actions is that she shall act naturally. The idea is to offset the false ideas of the daughters by showing them that simple manners and unaffected charm are the greatest of weapons in the conquest of man—the enemy.

There are parties given to which the rustic maid is invited.. At all times she is the life of the party, to the great disgust of the daughters and the other young ladies. They decide that the rural maid is "perfectly horrid" and that they will give her a good snubbing. Regardless of snubs and knocks the rural maid gets on very well with the young men. In fact, she monopolizes the attentions of the young Romeos, until her sudden demise would be the most welcome thing in the world to certain parties. Finally she is proposed to by the young man who is considered the best catch in town. She accepts him, not because he is a good catch, but because she herself has fallen in love with him. This result was a terrible shock to the two proud daughters, but it was a very convincing lesson to them that men consider the girl herself more than they do the dress she wears or the airs she puts on.

LUCAS SELL HIS HOUSES.

W. F. Lucas, who has been in the moving picture business in Temple, Texas, for the past six years, has sold his theaters, Majestic Nos. 1 and 2, to Jenkins & Wall. Mr. Jenkins has been connected with the Dalton Shows, of Dalton, Texas, for the past two years, and Mr. Wall has been Mr. Lucas' operator for two years. The houses will be run as before. The program consists of three reels of licensed pictures about ten days old and two songs by Elmore Fisk.

Scenes from "The Bells of Paradise" (Gaumont).

Another of those exquisite hand-colored features from the Gaumont Company is to be released on June 20 under the title of "The Bells of Paradise." This is a two-reel subject, the story of which is taken from mediaeval days based upon Italian folk-lore—the story of Francesca Teresina and her faithful companion, Benedetta There are a number of beautiful effects in this picture, most interesting of which is that of the church bells from which doves are seen to fly as the bells peal. This subject is about 1,700 feet long and the second reel is filled out by a tale from Zuyder Zee, also hand colored. This subject will be released through the Film Supply Company of America.

"St. George and the Dragon."

A Costly and Spectacular Production in Three Reels of the Ancient Legend—by the Milano Films Company.

THERE are many versions of "St. George and the Dragon," each varying according to the language in which it is printed. However, they all seem to unite on one point, and that is, that he was a Roman centurion who became disgusted with the licentious condition of the Roman Court and left the place. They also agree that, while on his journey, he rescued a beautiful princess who was about to be sacrificed to a dragon. With divine power suddenly given him, St. George dispatched the dragon, which had terrified a pagan city for years, and ever since, the name of St. George has come to stand for the purging of evil conditions. The red cross of St. George on a white field is the flag adopted by the Red Cross Society in its work of relieving or reducing physical pain.

The details, however, vary in the different languages, especially in geographical and proper names, and sometimes quite materially in the action. The Milano Films Company, being an Italian concern, would naturally give us the Italian version, which was the one seen by our reviewer in New York between our last issue and the present one. As a whole, the Milano version of St. George may be called a scenic masterpiece. The eye of the spectacular producer dominates the entire production and eclipses the acting and the photography. Surely the Milano Company is a master of mechanical stage-craft. The quality of "St. George and the Dragon" is on a par with that of the Odyssey, although the story of St. George is a more difficult one to tell in moving pictures. It is quite certain that the Milano version will require an intelligent explanation to have it thoroughly understood. With a lecture, however, it should prove to be one of the most charming of subjects, especially for women and children, dealing as it does with romantic and supernatural affairs. A legend and a fairy tale are much the same thing. "St. George and the Dragon" is as much of a fairy tale as it is a legend, and can be properly billed as such, which may be of some benefit from an advertising standpoint.

Scene from "St. George and the Dragon."

The Milano version is, in brief, as follows: The centurion George, becoming disgusted with the wanton regime at the Roman court, expostulates and expresses his indignation, and is banished by the Praetor at the suggestion of the freewoman, Tullia, whose love George had spurned. On his solitary journey, George comes to a cross-road's tablet near which are women weeping. He learns from them that their city has been for some years beleagured by a fiery monster, the fierce dragon Ismut. Each day the people have made sacrifices from their flocks to appease the appetite of the fire-breathing reptile. However, to satisfy his greed they are obliged also to send forth annually one of the most beautiful maidens of the town to be devoured by the demon in order that the rest of them may live.

On the day that St. George arrives at Antiochus, the news has gone forth that Angisa, the daughter of King Ozillo, has drawn the unlucky lot whereby she becomes the sacrifice to the dragon; hence the tears of the women by the road-side. When George arrives at the court he discovers that the king has gone insane at the news that his daughter must be sacrificed. The people of the city have gone through the agony so often that they believe there is no hope, and are resigned to the idea that the princess must die, that the others may live. The day of sacrifice arrives and the princess is drawn on a gorgeous float to the mouth of a cavern to await the coming of the subterranean monster. Meanwhile, in a dream, George, the centurion, receives a Heavenly message through angels sent from on high, investing him with power to attack and slay the dragon. With the great mass of people on the hillside looking on, St. George rides to the cavern's mouth, dispatches the hideous creature and saves the life of the princess, and the lives of many others who might have followed in her steps. For that act the Roman centurion has come to be known as St. George and the name has come to be associated as a figurehead with movements for the stamping out of evil conditions.

"St. George and the Dragon" will prove to be a great drawing card, providing it is presented properly and no pains be spared to give the audience a thorough understanding of what they are looking at, either by printed programmes or by a lecture, or both. There have been some very expensive and attractive posters, in the small and larger sizes, prepared for the picture, so that it will go forth as a complete production. Being a three-reel production is its greatest misfortune. It should either have been a five or six-reel production for use in the larger theaters, or a two-reel production for those houses giving short shows. Perhaps two reels would have been a more happy length in any event, as the story could easily be told in that length of film.

INTERNATIONAL FEATURES.

The insistent and growing demand of the exhibitor for feature productions and such subjects as are not handled as regular releases through the buying exchanges has made an opening for the feature film exchange. The past year has witnessed the incorporation of no less than one hundred and fifty of these feature film companies. Of the many who have invaded this new field, there are few that have surpassed, or we may say, attained the enviable reputation enjoyed by the International Film Traders, Inc., at 5 West 14th Street, New York City.

When the feature film was first talked of, Messrs. Spiegelthal & Dreher, sponsors for the International, looking far ahead, saw a great future for subjects of this nature and organized an educational film department. When it was seen that the scientific and historical subjects were making way for the larger dramatic productions of foreign make, such as Dante's "Inferno," Homer's "Odyssey" and Sarah Bernhardt, the International Film Traders made arrangements to import productions of this kind direct from the foreign manufacturers.

It is safe to say that to-day this company is importing more feature films than any of their competitors. They have their own representatives, educated in the American film market, representing them on the continent, with instructions to purchase all the features they can locate. In addition to this they have contracted with several of the largest Italian and German manufacturers for the exclusive American rights to their large dramatic productions.

Messrs. Spiegelthal & Dreher, operating as the International Film Traders, is an old and established concern. There is nothing of the fly-by-night nature about their business. For some time at the above address they have been conducting a legitimate trade with buyers in all parts of the world, whom they have never seen or met, but whose confidence they enjoy. Personally they are two very amiable gentlemen, without any trace of guile or chicanery about them. Wherever they go they are well known and well spoken of. Like many successful partners they are of distinctly opposite types. Mr. Spiegelthal is the big fellow of the concern, and Mr. Dreher is the little fellow, physically speaking, but nevertheless they are a great team.

Their business methods are not flashy, but more inclined to reliable and conservative dealings. It is the kind of a firm that will be still doing business long after many noisy and less substantial feature film concerns have gone their way.

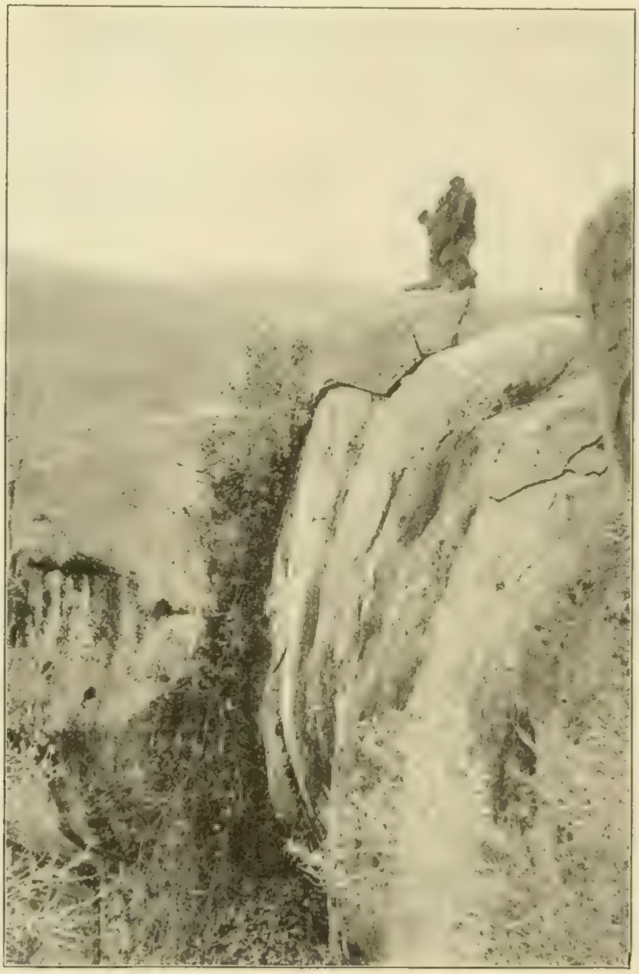
HAVERSTRAW AIRDOME.

Bierman & Richman opened the Imperial Airdome at Haverstraw, N. Y., Saturday evening, May 25. Seats have been provided for 600 persons and five reels of pictures with illustrated songs will be run nightly.

Death-Defying Feats of Moving Picture Players.

ANDERSON HAS NARROW ESCAPE.

Mr. G. M. Anderson, the famous director of the Essanay Western Stock Company, and creator of the well-known role of "Broncho Billy," escaped death in a horrible form during the taking of a great subject entitled "Broncho Billy's Bible," one of the finest of this splendid series and booked for release June 1. The climax of the picture is a thrilling hand-to-hand struggle between Mr. Anderson and Frederick Church, playing the "heavy," on the very edge of a precipice. This scene was rehearsed a number of times without mishap and Mr. Anderson had stationed the camera operator across the yawning chasm in a splendid position for the filming of the struggle. Realizing the importance of the scene, Mr. Anderson ordered it rehearsed once more.



After the preliminary incident of disarming Church through a clever trick, Anderson grappled with him and the two began their struggle. The "business" called for a quick break on the very edge of the precipice, in which both men spring back for a breathing spell, then again clinch. Mr. Anderson called for the break while his back was to the yawning chasm. Both men sprang back, then Church screamed with horror at seeing Anderson stumble, fall heavily and disappear over the edge of the precipice. Church fell on his face and peered over into the chasm, then gave a shout of joy, for a large protruding tree-root, some four feet down the side of the cliff, had saved Anderson's life and he was clinging desperately to it while his body hung suspended in mid-air. A rope was hurriedly procured by Church and the camera operator, and Anderson was pulled over the edge of the cliff to safety, suffering only from the nervous shock and painful lacerations about his hands. Nothing daunted, however, Anderson pluckily sent the camera operator back to his place and took the scene, but acknowledged after it was over that it was the narrowest escape of his life. The scene of the struggle is beautifully shown in the film, and few who view it will ever know what a horrible death Mr. Anderson averted by his presence of mind and good fortune.

THANHOUSER PLAYERS HAVE NARROW ESCAPE.

Marguerite Snow and James Cruze, noted as the "leads" in "She," "East Lynne," and other Thanhouser feature subjects, missed death by a narrow margin recently when a wagon in which they were fording a stream overturned and almost left them underneath. Another miraculous thing about the incident is that when it occurred the camera was really working—and didn't "run out" of film—as is usually the case! No, the whole thrilling escape is recorded in the last reel of "Jess," the picture that was being produced; and Miss Snow thus relates her own experience:

"It wasn't a lightweight wagon, let me say, to begin. There were a pair of gritty bronchos pulling it and they had to exert themselves at that, as the finished film will show. Mr. Cruze was playing Capt. John Neil, my lover—for I was Jess. And my rejected suitor, the Boer, Muller, portrayed by William Russell, had plotted to destroy us. While we were fording a stream in the wagon, Muller instructed his Boers to fire on us. And fire they did. Our bronchos became frightened. So did I, for I saw Mr. Cruze could not hold them. Then I saw that the face of the camera man over on the bank was lighted up, and that he was churning away with delight. One person, at least, wasn't frightened. At that moment the bronchos broke the traces and commenced to swim away. They were good swimmers, too, for they managed to make some headway against the current, and the current was SOME current. I heard Mr. Nicholls, our director, yell 'Jump!' from the bank, so jump it was. Both Mr. Cruze and myself can swim and we went right over. Then the current got in its 'doity woik.' Our combined weights must have served as a sort of balance to the wagon and, with us off, the wagon turned over onto us. Of course, it was quicker than I can tell it. I had hardly 'hit' the water than I saw the body of the wagon come swinging over on top of me. All I remember after that is that someone grabbed me and the wagon didn't touch me after all. The film, when I saw it at the factory, shows that Mr. Cruze was the 'grabber.' Of course, I might have known he was the only one near, but in that minute I simply knew I was caught up by some human—later I was told I had fainted."

"THOSE WERE HAPPY DAYS" (Powers).

Stories of children always interest and the child dramas and comedies now being produced by the Powers Motion Picture Company are delightful tales, told in a charming way. Director Matthews has a happy faculty of encouraging juveniles in a kindly and patient manner, with the result that he is producing some novel stories.

In "Those Were Happy Days" he has hit upon a comedy theme that is unique as well as interesting and is productive of many hearty laughs.

Willie and Margaret, brother and sister, mutiny against going to school and attempt to play "hookey." They are found by the stern father, who turns them over to their mother. Their faces scrubbed, and immaculately arrayed, they are sent to school armed with a lunch basket of generous capacity. They are still rebellious and cast about for some plan to evade study. Stumbling over a can filled with black paint, the little girl has an inspiration and she unfolds it to Willie. The boy is delighted. They will decorate their faces with the paint and feign illness—in short, they will be, to all intents and purposes, afflicted with measles. The paint applied, they trudge on to school and take their seats. They are soon noticed by the gaunt pedagog and he scans their features closely. Their plan works admirably. School is dismissed instanter and the scholars are urged to flee from the two afflicted children in order to escape the contagion.

Scene from "Those Were The Happy Days" (Powers).

The teacher sprints for a doctor and the parents are notified. Curious villagers ask questions and in a short time the whole hamlet is aroused. Anxious mothers hustle their children indoors and there is consternation. While a general hunt is being instituted for them, Willie and Margery are enjoying the holiday in a cool and inviting spot eating their lunch. They are finally found by the searchers and are clasped in the arms of their apprehensive parents. By contact with their clothing the paint smears and the deception is discovered, to the mortification of the parents and the wrath of the teacher.

THE CRYSTAL'S INITIAL PRODUCTIONS.

At Weber's Theater, Broadway and Twenty-Ninth Street, New York City, on Monday evening the Crystal Film Company showed two films, "As Fate Wills" and "His Awful Secret." The pictures were favorably received by the spectators, the interest was maintained throughout the entire run, laughter alternating with the deep silence that indicates close attention. The photography was of a high order; the acting was of the best. In "As Fate Wills," Marion Earnsworth was particularly interesting, vivacious and natural. Edwin McKin, as a villain, shared honors with Earle Metcalfe, who portrayed the part of his victim.

Three women took prominent roles in "His Awful Secret"—Teresa Dale, Agnes Stone and Jean Salisbury, and their work was uniformly good. "Baby Burns," a four-year-old, as she was taken from under an automobile, gave a perfect representation of the lifeless child—limp and motionless.

Among those who witnessed the initial production of the Crystal were Ludwig G. B. Erb, president of the company; Joseph A. Golden, vice-president; John Urie, in charge of the photography, and Harry Zeller, head of the mechanical department.

PEACE BY PIECE.

Peace by piece, that is the motif and the moral of "The Price of Peace," the Rex release of Thursday, June 6th. When his young wife died the world descended into darkness. It might be said that he died with her, for breathing alone is not living. Then he tried to conquer the torture of his thoughts. Solitude, gaiety, revelry, charity, renunciation and the devil were of no avail. Still he saw the sweet face that was no longer, felt its warmth near his own, and his eyes looked several miles away, into hers—two eyes and memory.

Scene from "The Price of Peace" (Rex).

After the bitter battle with his soul and his senses, after the memory had proven the mastery, he found peace in God. When he entered the monastery to dedicate his hopes to the powerful peace "that passeth understanding" his heart sang a madrigal of its own liberation, and his soul was a paean of freedom.

"VIRGINIUS" (Reliance).

In this production we have an ambitious pictured version of James Sheridan Knowles' classic tragedy, with Mr. Hal Reid in the title role. The production was staged by Mr. Reid as well, therefore he deserves the bulk of the credit for the result. It is a two-reel picture and for that reason can enter more fully into detail than have previous productions of this picture that have been made in one reel. The scenic effects are capably handled and show a regard for correctness in Roman architecture. The classic Roman costumes make it a pleasurable spectacle to witness, as a change from ordinary everyday attire.

Though the story seems too well known to need repetition, one is apt to forget the context, and for the benefit of our busy readers we will outline it briefly. Virginius is a Roman citizen who lives happily with his wife, Servia, and their daughter, Virginia. Virginia is courted by Icilius, a young Roman soldier. Their troth is plighted before Virginius and other relatives, and in due time the two young people are married. At this time Appius is the Roman dictator. Some time after the marriage, he notices Virginia on the street and becomes attracted by her beauty. Having autocratic power, Appius directs his soldiers to seize Virginia and hold her as one of his slaves. Icilius receives his death wound while protecting his wife's liberty and honor. Virginius is brought to trial for having had a hand in the defense of his daughter. He appears before Appius and is condemned to die. Before being led away, however, he plunges his dagger into the breast of his daughter Virginia, thereby thwarting Appius. Virginius is placed in a cell and soon becomes a madman. The tide of public opinion turns against Appius on account of the tyranny and destruction he has wrought. Later, he too is thrown into a cell. It is the same cell occupied by the demented Virginius, who, finding himself face to face with his dastardly foe, chokes the breath from his body with his strong hands.

"THE HALF-BREED'S WAY" (Nestor).

The Nestor Company are releasing a splendid drama this week under the title of "The Half-Breed's Way." It tells of the faithfulness and devotion of a half-breed to the wife of his employer, which finally results in the death of the poor fellow. Harry Von Meter deserves credit for this wonderful bit of character acting. Vivian Rich portrays the character of the much-abused wife and does extremely well, while George Beech as the brutal husband is also worthy of mention.

Scene from "The Half-Breed's Way" (Nestor).

Exciting chases and thrilling scenes, not mentioning the wonderful photography, makes this picture one of the finest of Nestors. It is to be released on June 3rd and ought to be most popular.

"CUPID THROUGH PADLOCKS" (American).

Pearl and Adelaide Abel possessed a father stern and not overfond of young men suitors. Abel was a bachelor, lived with his two daughters in a cabin close to Deadwood and went occasionally to the country store. One day, in company with the two girls, he made his monthly trip. The girls waited outside for him and there met John and Will. It was pretty nearly love at first sight and the courtship progressed nicely until old Abel emerged with his arms full of parcels. He showed them the butt of his gun and courtship ceased.

Scene from "Cupid Through Padlocks" (American).

But the boys found opportunity to see the girls in spite of that, until old Abel found them one day, each with the girl of his choice closely wrapped in his arms. He threatened to shoot and the boys fled precipitately. Once again they saw the girls, and exchanged kisses and other things through an open window, because old Abel had securely fastened the door.

There came a time when opportunity beckoned. The boys had a mother, a widow, and still youthful in heart. She called on old Abel. They found each other excellent company, until the girls in mock anger drove her from the house. She rushed into the forest, screaming for help on another occasion, and while Abel tried to rescue her, the young lovers saw each other. As time wore on, the old couple became more fond of each other, and then, one day, the two young couples found to their surprise that their troubles were over, for out on a bench beneath the trees Father and Mother were planning a future of their own.

"STAGE-STRUCK MAMIE" (Majestic).

Mabel Trunnelle is the whole thing in this picture and she deserves all the credit. The character she plays is something on the Sis Hopkins order, and shows the wide range of her ability.

With equal skill she can play the heaviest of tragedy and the lightest of comedy. In "Stage Struck Mamie" she is a scream. It is a full reel subject, but the action is so rapid and the interest so continuous that it seems all too short. As a comedy it is a gem and will surely get the laughs.

As the title would imply, Mamie is a country girl who gets the stage fever. An unscrupulous agent in the city has advertised for a young lady with dramatic aspirations and $5,000. The advertisement appeals to Mamie with such force that she actually convinces her old father that she is the proper party to answer the advertisement, and gets him to start her off to the city with $5,000 in her bag. She arrives in the city and goes to the third-rate dramatic office. Her appearance is hailed there as though she were an angel from Heaven. The glimpse of so much money all at one time makes the sharpers so nervous that they can scarcely keep their hands off of it. An act is rehearsed by Mamie and an old "has-been" actor; more as a legal formality than with expectation of its making good.

To the great surprise of the agent, the act makes such a hit that Mamie is offered $2,500 a week by the manager of a vaudeville circuit who saw it or heard of it. The unscrupulous agent tried to get her to sign her time away for a long period at $30.00 a week, but he was just a little too late. The acting of Miss Trunnelle is the feature of the picture and we can advise exhibitors not to hesitate to book it for their Saturday night scream.

"A WESTERN CHILD'S HEROISM" (Champion).

In a clearing in the Blockwood Hills, lives Bill Burton, a miner, with his wife and child, in a little log cabin. Burton befriends a Mexican who has escaped pursuing officers of the law, wounded. During the Mexican's convalescence, the miner strikes it rich and the gold is stored away in the chimney. This is discovered by the Mexican, who makes ready to rob his benefactor. While Burton is gone, he makes for the gold, but is discovered by the miner's wife, who struggles with him. The little daughter now takes a hand and at the pistol point forces the ingrate to the door, where he goes off with maledictions on his lips. He soon returns with marauding Indians and they sneak upon the cabin and set it afire. The little girl discovers their approach in time to escape on horseback, stealing on the back of one tethered by the Indians, and she sets off for help. The fire now rages furiously, at which juncture the cowboys dash up and put the villains to flight.

ROY AITKEN IN CHARGE OF MAJESTIC.

Mr. Roy E. Aitken is at present in charge of the Majestic Motion Picture Company. The position of managing director will probably be occupied by him permanently. Mr. Aitken is manager of the Western Import Company, of London, which concern handles the European sale of Majestic and Reliance film. He makes many trips back and forth across the Atlantic during the year, and is in very close touch with the wants of the English market. Mr. Aitken is a great believer in comedy, and the Majestic from this time on will specialize in comedy productions. Not especially because Mr. Aitken likes comedy, but because there is always a ready market for good comic pictures. If their early releases along that line are any criterion, the Majestic comedies will soon have a fine reputation, judging by the few we have seen that were produced under the Aitken régime, and under the directorship of Mr. T. Hayes Hunter.

INQUIRIES

B. D.—We have no particular information as to the player in question and in view of the many letters received in the last week, all of which have come from Philadelphia, and all of which have been bubbling over with enthusiasm, we are not inclined even to mention names. The player has worked with at least three other New York companies without arousing very great enthusiasm and being a reformed press agent ourselves we are afraid that the glowing light will remain hidden under the bushel. If you are not among the admiring friends we beg to inform you that the data you have is correct and that we have nothing to add, since this is an inquiry and not a press column.

HARRY—The late Mace Greenleaf worked for both Reliance and Solax prior to his connection with Lubin. Owen Moore is not connected at present, but we would not be surprised to learn that he has hooked up. We do not ask Rex questions because the press agent is too busy to answer them. We are in possession of the name of the Biograph player who was loaned to Essanay, but since this was a courtesy we do not feel that it would be courteous on our part to give out the information.

H. K.—So long ago we've forgotten Uncle Tom, but we will ask the Vitagraph who it was, so keep watching. We are not going to ask where "The Lady of the Lake" was taken, on the grounds that any company is entitled to the locations it digs up. The Republic has no Western studio that we know of. The Essanay Company has a special field company in the Southwest at present, making some three reel stuff. See page 812 in our last issue for the details.

G. C.—The cast and description does not seem to indicate the part you mention, but we think you have reference to Ben F. Wilson in Edison's "Out of the Depths."

STEVENS—The Vitagraph "Oliver Twist" is too far to the rear to be recalled by cast. We have not noticed that the films' you name are in bad general condition. Probably you see them after they have been badly handled. As a rule the photography is excellent. We lack that Essanay cast. C. G. P. C. is the new mark of European-made Pathe releases. Cutting out the French spelling it is Company General Phonographs and Cinematographs. "Around the World in 80 Days" was done into film so long ago that most persons have forgotten it. We pass up the cowboy question. Possibly it's because real cowboys are now employed in most releases that they look "stagy" as you state.

FRANKFORT FAN—We have not the slightest interest in the question as to whether Miss Ruth Blackwell is the wife, widow, mother, sister, daughter or great aunt of Carlyle Blackwell. Max Linder has never been with the American Pathe Company. Kenneth Casey seems to be with the Vitagraph still, though he has been rather still of late.

E. F.—The pug-nosed blonde Biograph player has no more name than any of the others. Neither her blondness nor her pug nose entitles her to the use of her name while with the Biograph.. We think your guess is about nine and a half points off the truth.

S.—We wish you would write your name so we could at least get the initials. There seems to be no likelihood that Miss Lawrence and Arthur Johnson will be co-stars. Miss Lawrence is to head her own independent company and Mr. Johnson is having a lot of fun as director and star of one of the sections of the Lubin Company. Unless you're an actor you cannot comprehend the joy of being able, as the director, to tell yourself, as the star, to stand more nearly in the center of the stage.

RICHARD ROE—There were two nervous suitors in Edison's "A Dumb Wooing." One was so nervous he stuttered and the other was so nervous his collar choked him. The one who stuttered was Barry O'Moore. The one with the troublesome collar was Yale Benner. We do not know just what that Cines trademark purports to be. It seems to be a five-pointed flower with smaller points between the major petals. There are three small petals between each of the five large ones and the whole is surrounded by a border with ornamental work. The Biograph interiors are studio scenes, though in Los Angeles an outdoor studio might have been used.

F. M.—Mrs. William Todd was the Widow in Essanay's "The Widow Jenkins' Admirers." The Western Section of the Essanay Company has no editor and does not desire that any scripts be submitted to it. The photoplay address is Chicago, but they are not buying at present.

N. T.—The player in the Essanay pictures you mention is not a regular member of the company, but a Biograph player loaned the Essanay during the illness of Miss Bertram.

F. C. B.—The newest version of the Townsend bill provides a special class for photoplays and we believe that this classification will be found in the bill if it passes. In this case there will be no question as to registration. The understanding of Photoplay is a script so complete that two directors, working apart, can take the same script and produce substantially the same story. In other words your story must be told completely in action and insert.

V. P.—Sure there is going to be a dinner. You'll be invited.

T. P. D.—The "Special" department of the Lubin Company is merely a special branch of the photoplay room which offers a better than usual price for first chance at better than usual stuff. If you have had the training and experience to permit you to turn out real photoplays it will pay you to look it up, but the novice will do well to keep away. Only the trained writer is eligible. The general department looks after the rest.

Simplex The Peer of
All Moving Picture Machines

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY:

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theaters.
ARTHUR S. WHITE, Manager Moving Picture Department,
Percy G. Williams Circuit of theaters.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
WM. J. GANE, Manhattan Theater.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theaters. WALTER ROSENBERG, Savoy Theater.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
HARRY LEVINE, Manager, Riverside Theater.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. STERN, Proprietor, Bleecker Theater.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. CRANE, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.
W. D. KOLLE, Prospect Hall, Brooklyn.

It is the best we have ever used and we have ordered two more for our other theaters.

"THE SUNSET GUN" (Edison), May 24.—Mr. Bannister Merwin, the writer of this picture, scores in it another emphatic success. It is a stirring, human and deeply truthful picture of an old soldier's last Memorial Day. There are village scenes, a parade of veterans to the cemetery, and the old soldier's dream memories of the war. He dreams of morning roll call, of battles, of the sunset gun and of taps blown over the sleeping soldiers in bivouac on the field of battle. It is grandly done, and very emotional. The people applauded warmly. Let us impress upon exhibitors that such a picture as this, it is in truth a masterpiece, deserves some special preparation. It will repay it. It needs good martial music, drums, fifes and bugle notes, at the very least. Don't miss such a chance of making an impression. This picture plus good music will be worth while.

Mr. Mark McDermott plays the old soldier, we almost said is the old soldier, so worthily does he set him forth. He will win a host of good friends by this picture. As it is, as a player, he stands second to none in the estimation of people who appreciate art and imagination. He has won his reputation outside of romantic roles and on account of ability alone.

The picture is so good and true that although a large crowd of onlookers watched it in making, all of them seem to have a natural place in it. They were feeling what it stood for. The actors had lost themselves in it and, strange to say, the uninvited but welcome watchers also had. It is excellent on every count.

Miss Miriam Nesbitt is the soldier's daughter; Yale Boss is his grandson. Among the G. A. R. men are Charles Ogle, Robert Brower, Wm. Wadsworth, Harry Linton, Wm. West, Guy Hedlund and Edw. Boulden. Following the G. A. R. men march a group of school children, in white with flowers and little flags. Then come the citizens. It is a photoplay of real life.

"DARBY AND JOAN" (Lubin), May 22.—Miss May Buckley plays, as lady's maid to a countess, the most interesting role in this costume picture. The time seems to be about 200 years ago in England. As a story, it is dramatic and interesting; but it will appeal more on account of the art with which it was acted, set and photographed. These scenes of old time English life in palace, cottage, village inn, and along the roadside hedges, are very good indeed. It makes a graceful, pleasing picture.

"HER BETTER NATURE" (Eclipse), May 22.—A picture played by famous artists from the Parisian theaters. It is more a good vehicle for emotional acting than a convincing or effective story. As usual with Eclipse pictures, it is well acted, and well photographed. The scene making is very artistic.

"THE JUMPING CHAMPION, MACMORELAND" (Eclipse), May 22.—This topical picture on the same reel, is a first-class offering. MacMoreland performs, and with the greatest nonchalance, the most astonishing feats. He is a wonder. We have never seen any jumping like this either in life or in the picture. This topical brings the release up pretty high in the scale. It is also well photographed.

"DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND" (Vitagraph), May 24.—A farce comedy of a very high order; it is a picture for everybody, critical or otherwise. A large Broadway audience, Friday afternoon, seemed greatly pleased with it and laughed heartily, but not boisterously. It features Miss Flora Finch, who plays a jealous wife. She goes to the length of dressing up as a young man so that she can find out how her husband (John Bunny plays the role)) amuses himself. It is absolutely indescribable; but it is very funny indeed. The Vitagraph Company is very fortunate in these two clever players; there is no comedy team anywhere in the business that can match them. In this picture they have made a sure feature. Also in the picture are Wallace Reid, Dick Rosson, Miss Ray Ford and Mrs. Costello.

"A CLOSE CALL" (Biograph), May 23.—A brisk, well-played farce in which a white street faker, with face blackened as a coon, is mistaken by "Jasper's" old employer, and chased with a view to a hanging. It made laughs; but, although it is surely good entertainment, it doesn't come up to the recent Biograph farces in its scenario. Photographically it is fine.

"HELEN'S MARRIAGE" (Biograph), May 23. A cleverly conducted farce, but with no real situation. The audience laughed a good deal and seemed pleased with it.

"A GOOD CATCH" (Essanay), May 23.—A farce comedy, a large part of which is of the run and knock over order. There are other things in it; but nothing that is really very funny. The audience liked part of it and got some good laughs. The players are pleasing in themselves. The camera work is good.

"THE FORTUNES OF A COMPOSER" (Vitagraph), May 21.—Mr. Charles Kent, by very sincere acting, holds up, in this picture, a situation that otherwise would have failed to convince, would, perhaps, have had little effectiveness. As it is, up to the last scene, which is tremendously effective, the interest in the story's outcome, while always awake, is secondary to the picture's lesser qualities, its acting, lighting, scene making and photography, which all are of high order. The story of the old composer's loss of memory and his separation from his friends, and even of the home coming to die in the empty theater where he had just heard his great opera rendered, are not impossible; but they are not made very real. There is plenty in the picture that does ring true and the scene where the composer dies is fine. The acting all through is excellent. Mrs. Julia Swayne Gordon plays the composer's wife; Edith Halleran and Norma Talmadge play his two daughters, and do excellent work.

"THEIR GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY" (Vitagraph), May 22.—This is a good picture that people will like. It has strength and is a life portrayal; but its strength is in its true character drawing and not so much in its situation. This situation is not impossible; but it has one very noticeable improbability—the fact that an only son who loved his mother dearly would hardly have neglected to correspond with her, when he became very successful in the city. Reviewers hear strangers around them make to each other such remarks very often. However, this picture has very much truth and beauty. The old couple are Mr. Van Dyke Brooke and Mrs. Maurice, and their son is Mr. Costello. The farm scenes are as fine as can be and all the others are just as good in themselves. These three players are very strong and the producer has composed his picture very commendably. The camera work is artistic.

"'TIS MOTHER" (Pathe), May 23.—Miss Gwendolyn Pates leads in this picture, first as a slip of a girl, light-hearted, smiling and just a bit roguish, who helps in a millinery store, and in the later scenes, after she has eloped, as a married lady with a fine house and servants of her own. It is distinctly her picture; she is its center of interest all the way through, and she fills it with her own grace and charm. The story springs from a light comedy situation, not believable; but amusing and pleasingly romantic. It makes a popular comedy very clearly told and pictured.

"HER CONVICT BROTHER" (Kalem), May 22.—The leading lady in this picture is Miss Alice Neason, who was recently with the Vitagraph Company in its Brooklyn studio. She plays a girl with a brother in prison, who didn't dare tell her husband. Brother escapes and the husband discovers that she is protecting another unknown man. In outline, this situation is too well known to need retelling. We have never seen it produced so that it resembled real life; but it is a situation that gives ample chance for emotional acting, and it is as effective in this picture as in any we have seen, more effective than in most of them. The camera work is excellent.

"THE GIRL WITH THE LANTERN" (Selig), May 23.—A railroad melodrama by the Chicago company. The love story shows us the farmer's niece and the telegraph operator at the country station. The uncle objects. One night, while her uncle and aunt are away, the lover calls the girl up and tells her that two trains that can not be warned are headed towards each other on the same track running past her farm. She wraps a red bandanna around a farm lantern and signals one of the trains in time to have it back out of danger. She has a very unconvincingly hard time in accomplishing this; but the picture is pretty well acted and well photographed. The people seem to like railroad stories and the audience seemed pleased with this picture.

"A BACHELOR'S WATERLOO" (Lubin), May 23.—A romance-comedy in which a rich bachelor (Mr. Mitchell) when besieged by designing mammas with more or less eligible daughters, takes refuge in the country house of a friend whose eldest daughter (Miss Lottie Brisco) is too young still to be feared; but not too young to fall in love with. Little Buster Johnson and a little girl also have parts in it. It is a pleasing and entertaining little picture that doesn't pretend to distinction. The photography is as usual.

"THE ARTIST AND THE BRAIN SPECIALIST" (Edison), May 22.—A very good farce by Mr. Harry Furniss, the well-known English illustrator. He, himself, plays in it the leading part, as Harry Furniss, an English artist who helps a fellow painter who is not yet well known, is sick, and whose wife and two little children are in distress. It was the duty of another artist, Sir Tufto Dauber, to extend, as administrator of the "Benevolent Association's" fund, help to other artists in distress; but Sir Tufto was too lofty to bother, so Mr. Furniss makes up as a great brain specialist to make him think he has gone crazy. Mr. Furniss can add touches to Sir Tufto's drawings when he isn't looking and, for a farce, the development of the situation is excellent. Sir Tufto Dauber is played by Walter Edwin; the sick artist by Barry O'Moore; his wife by Miriam Nesbitt, and his two children by Edna May Weick and Yale Boss.

"THE PROSPECTOR'S SWEETHEART" (Pathe), May 25.—A romantic melodrama with fresh and interesting backgrounds and a story that has good interest. Two girls love the hero. One is a jealous senorita who first tries to harm the American girl and in the end shows noble renunciation. There is no real contrasts such as make the best melodramas deeply effective; but it doesn't drag much. The camera work is only fair.

"THE REDEMPTION OF BEN FARLAND" (Vitagraph), May 25.—A ranch story. Ben Farland, a young Westerner (played by Robert Burns) has a besetting sin—drink. He works for the father of the girl he loves (played by Edna Fisher). Because she still believes that he can free himself, he makes another struggle and succeeds in keeping straight. The acting is of good quality; but the scenario isn't very dramatic. The camera work is only fair.

"A WESTERN PRINCE CHARMING" (Edison), May 25.—This is from one of O. Henry's stories and one that has been very widely read; for it appeared in the syndicated, or "patent insides" of thousands of little country weeklies. Perhaps the stories of no other man so readily serve as moving picture scenarios; one might almost suspect that O. Henry learned to write in the nickelodions. Perhaps it is because his appeal, being distinctly to the unsophisticated part of us, parallels the appeal of the most popular pictures. This picture surely will be popular. It awakens our sympathy for a little girl. drudging as help in a rough Western boarding house, and then satisfies the child's dream of romance for us. In doing this, he makes use of nothing that is not found in common, ordinary life. It is a picture with cowboys in it; but by no means a cowboy picture. It is a comedy; but not one that will make many laughs. Its effect is to warm the heart with sympathy. It is the kind of picture that very unobtrusively stirs a feeling that, by suggesting a wide human bond of sympathy, consoles. The whole cast acts excellently and the photography and every other element in the picture is praiseworthy.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 22" (Pathe), May 27.—There is a very sensational item included in the picture this week. It shows the attack upon the garage near Paris, in which the bandit Bonnot took refuge, recently. The outlaw fired from the little stone building upon the police. A wagon loaded high with wood and straw was backed up behind it. Using this as a shield, the police were able to place a dynamite cartridge under its foundation. We see this and also see the building blown to pieces about the bandit's ears. Besides this there is a good view of the Oxford-Cambridge boat race at Henly, this spring; a series of speedy motor boats taken at Monaco from a hydroaeroplane which follows and overtakes them, skimming the air above the Mediterranean Sea. We also have a view of the recent Fiesta Arboria, at Chico, California and other views; but miss the usual fashion plate from Paris and the smile that goes with it.

"A BEAST AT BAY" (Biograph), May 27.—A melodramatic picture existing chiefly to show a race between an automobile and a locomotive. It is not quite up to Biograph's high standard; but doesn't drag and is both humorous and exciting. At moments, it also gives a chance for first class Biograph acting. The camera work is serviceable; but it also isn't quite as good as usual.

"THE SENORITA'S BUTTERFLY" (Lubin), May 27.—A romantic, pretty picture in Mexican costumes and set mostly around some elaborately decorated and park-like country place in Southern California. The backgrounds show two fine dwellings and lawns grown with palms and flowering shrubs. The senorita with her dark eyes and thick black hair is an acceptable heroine. Her people want her to marry some one else; but the rich and young Don Carlos has seen her. She likes to catch butterflies with a big net. She sees the Don's feathered cap as he hides behind a big flowery bush and catches it with her net. Later, he gets a job on the place as gardener and, at length, the unwelcome suitor is discomfited. The photography is very good. It makes a pleasant picture, slight in texture, acceptable for summer time, when love stories are popular.

"THE DESERT SWEETHEART" (Essanay), May 25.—Another tragic desert picture with much to commend it. Some of the scenes are intensely interesting. It is a character sketch. It shows the sweetheart (Miss Bertram) as forgetting her prospector lover (Mr. Anderson) and as running away with a second man, one who had been treated hospitably by the prospector. The two get lost in the desert and the selfish interloper abandons roughly the girl to die of thirst. She is saved by the prospector; but when the man is found, he is dead. The picture doesn't seem to add up to a convincing picture of humanity. It makes the girl, in her attitude first toward the prospector, then toward the interloper and after all that again toward the prospector, seem abnormal. The acting, scene making and photography are excellent.

"THE LOST HAT" (Selig), May 24.—A slight but amusing farce set mostly in a country hotel. It deals chiefly with two drummers, guests of the house and a tramp who picked up, along the track, a new hat lost by one of the drummers. The other drummer's hat was just like it and the man whose hat fell out of the car window put it on. Both hats had the owners' initials. Drummer No. 1 came in drunk and left the hat he was wearing in the wrong room, a lady's. The tramp stole some cigars and left his hat near the office counter. So first one drummer and then the other is accused of wrong doing of which he knows nothing. It is pretty well put on and photographed.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS, NO. 4" (Selig), May 24.—This occupies about half the reel. It made laughter. In quality it is like the other three that we have already seen.

"FOXY CUPID" (C. G. P. C.), May 24.—A well photographed and well acted farce that is fresh. It turns on the seasickness of Papa who is trying to get around Cupid by taking his daughter on a sea voyage. Several of the scenes were taken on board a ship and the seasickness is quite realistic; but never vulgar. It is a pleasant offering.

"THE SYLVERE SISTERS ON THE DOUBLE TRAPEZE" (C. G. P. C.), May 24.—On the same reel is this well-photographed and colored picture of an acrobatic performance by two women.

"THE FIGHTING DERVISHES OF THE DESERT" (Kalem), May 27.—The Kalem Company, in an editorial foreword to this picture, announces that it is to be the first of a series and that the whole series aims to give truthful and instructive pictures of life in Egypt and the East. This exciting and well-written picture, under the cloak of a love story, in which a Sheik of the Desert and the daughter of a Coptic priest (Christian) figures gives us a very welcome glimpse of life at the edge of the desert. The Copts figured largely in the first three centuries of the Christian Era. They are a distinct people and furnished many martyrs and leaders to the early Church and are still Christian in spite of Islam. The Dervishes hate them accordingly.

The Dervish hero of this picture (played by Jack Clark) falls in love with the Coptic maid (played by Gene Gauntier) as she comes to the well with its camel-driven wheel to lift up the water. It is a typical Egyptian scene. The courtship of the Sheik and the refusal by the girl's father, because the man is not a Christian, occupy the next few scenes. Some of these scenes were photographed in the desert and picture real Arabs and their roving life; some were photographed in a Coptic village. The next scenes show the raid on the village by the fanatic tribesmen and the repentance of the Sheik and his rescue of the girl. The final scenes show him taking the Christian oath in the old ruin at Luxor and the departure with the girl toward a happier land—French Algeria perhaps. The more a spectator knows the more he will get out of such a picture as this; but it is no "high-brow" production. The gallery also will like it. It is very well photographed. It is a picture for people who want substantial pictures.

"UNDER A FLAG OF TRUCE" (Kalem), May 24.—A good and thrilling war-time picture well made and effective. It has interesting Southern scenes and a very acceptable heroine and good hero. It is much better in its idea than usual, although it utilizes the well-known, substantial melodramatic formula. The ugly villain, seeking vengeance for a well-deserved whipping, has brought his tough bushwackers and is attacking in a cabin the pretty heroine and her family. The hero, a Northern lieutenant, sees this and dashes in to help in the defense. The odds are twenty to one and the defender's ammunition is running short. The heroine darts out, breaks through the line and rides for help. She comes on the field just before a skirmish between the Blue and Grey and brings, under a flag of truce, both sides to the rescue.

It is very well done and very commendable. Emerson says that a noble action makes the bystanders shine. A truly noble or truly human action in a picture lifts a whole audience up and adds to its life. This effect is far more marked when the action is fresh, as in this case. This picture convinces us that the uniting of Blue and Grey, and the Stars and Stripes, with the Stars and Bars fluttering alongside, riding to help against a lawless band, was possible. Such a fine action was worthy of a picture. If it were taken from history, as it must have been, it would have been a good thing to have said so in a leader or a subtitle. The photography is good. It is a worthy picture.

"THE TRIUMPH OF RIGHT" (Vitagraph), May 27.—A good Western melodrama of clearly defined type with its Mexican villain, its careless man taught a lesson, its child heroine to plead with a stern sheriff and its sick and dying wife and mother. It is well made in every way, but has no especial merit to mark it off from other good and valuable pictures of its kind.

"JIM'S WIFE" (Edison), May 28.—A typical melodrama with the usual villainy and heroics. It is a logging story, set in the Maine woods in winter time and has some extremely beautiful forest pictures, such as the falling pine cut on the hillside, the great log dragger making its way, with puffing steam and a long train behind it, along the snowy forest road. The hero of the picture, by the way, is left bound and helpless one dark night in the path of this tremendous monster. His brave wife runs slipping along the icy road to save him. It is true that the audience laughed at wrong times; but it was a sophisticated audience.

"THE MUSKETEERS' DUEL" (C. G. P. C.), May 28.—A graceful, courtly picture of France in the time of Louis XIII. It is colored, set in beautiful scenes and well photographed. The story serves very well; it doesn't convince, isn't intended to; but gives a well utilized chance for making scenes that are worth seeing and pleasing entertainment.

"A LESSON IN LIQUID AIR" (C. G. P. C.), May 28.—A very instructive, interesting picture giving sensational experiments with liquid air. This film ought to be a very good feature. It is thoroughly popular, more or less exciting, and perfectly photographed.

"A CHILD OF THE WILDERNESS" (Selig), May 28.—A picture that in subtile ways reminds one of "The Danites" as pictured by the Selig people. Perhaps this is because it deals with a certain ruthless type of character that the rush of fortune hunters to the West developed. Such a cruel, grasping man is the evil genius in this picture. His wife dies. Rather than bother with his little son, he pays Indians to adopt him. A few years later, a white prospector finds the little light-haired Indian in the hills and buys him from the foster parents to have trouble later with the boy's own father. It makes an effective picture. The idea is new and big. It is clearly and smoothly told and well acted. The camera work is good. It is a picture that will be liked.

"MARGARET'S AWAKENING" (Essanay), May 28.—The heroine of this picture, Margaret, is a little girl of about eight and very winsome. It shows how she had been reluctant to go to bed and next morning wanted to tell her daddy about it. She slips down to the garage where she thinks her father is and falls alseep again in the automobile. A few hours later, she finds herself with only pajamas on, in the automobile, which is standing in front of the city court house; her father was a lawyer. It is a slight, but very promising situation; but it was unconvincingly stated and not very convincingly developed. The scenario alone seems to be at fault; the picture is well acted and well photographed.

Independent.

"THE FOREIGN SPY" (Nestor), May 27.—An American story, dealing chiefly with a clever, unscrupulous woman in the employ of a foreign power who is anxious to obtain accurate plans of United States' coast defence forts. The woman, Celeste, is played by Miss Josephine Ricketts. Celeste has already caused the ruin of one American captain (played by Sydney Ayers) and is about to treat a lieutenant in the same way; but the captain comes to his rescue. It is not a very strong picture, chiefly because it permits us to sympathize with no one in it; it lacks contrast in its characters. This always leaves a sense of flatness in a melodrama. The photography is good.

"THE SCALAWAG" (Nestor), May 29.—Miss Eugenie Forde and Mr. Jack Conway play the leading roles in this picture, as husband and wife. The husband is the scalawag. The story of this bad-man-father, whose wife left him, taking their baby, and of his death, furnishes the picture with scenes that thrill and scenes whose appeal is to the emotions. The child, a little girl now grown to be about ten years, gives a very pleasing touch. It is a chase picture; but as usual in Nestor pictures, freshness in handling, speediness and first-class camera work make it again something that is different.

"SANTA MONICA AUTO ROAD RACE" (Nestor), May 25.—Taken as a whole, this picture is very well photographed. It includes portraits of the leaders. It is short, but some of it is thrilling.

"OIL FIELDS, CALIFORNIA" (Nestor), May 25.—A general picture of the oil industry in California showing wells even under the Pacific Ocean. One series of views shows a fire. It is very instructive as well as interesting.

"SEEING LOS ANGELES" (Imp), May 25.—Los Angeles seems to be a very lively as well as a beautiful city. We have seen much of the city and its magnificent parks in pictures; but in this there is much of fresh interest. The views are very well taken. The closing scene is a beautiful view of a sunlit ocean, taken from a great breakwater of stone.

"THE MAID'S STRATEGEM" (Imp), May 25.—On the same reel is this comedy of kitchen and ballroom, in which a maid (Vivian Prescott) accepts one of her mistress's invitations and, in her mistress's clothes and as her niece, has a triumph at a ball. Things happen on account of it. Because of the players and the sets, as well as because of a good, though slight, situation, the picture is a success. Miss Bancroft as the mistress takes a strikingly beautiful photograph. The butler is Mr. Cumpson; the valet is Mr. Ober; the cook is Rolinda Bainbridge, and there are also others. The photography is fine.

"THE HOUSEKEEPER" (Powers), May 25.—A picture that is very well acted and conducted. The situation is fairly strong and has life. The scenario made use of some incidents that were not wholly convincing; but this is a melodrama whose chief object is to show a clash between right and wrong; to make wrong seem to flourish in the beginning and to bring it to justice in the end. As such it is effective, especially the first-half, while the ending is good in its humor. The camera work is very good.

"SEEING WASHINGTON" (Republic), May 25.—Recently the Brotherhood of Indians met in Washington. These views of the Capital were taken at that time and show the braves sight-seeing. The scenes are lovely; but sub-titles are needed.

"HER BIRTHDAY ROSES" (Republic), May 25.—On the same reel is this comedy. The situation has been used before. The girl was only eighteen. The lover ordered eighteen roses; but he was a good customer and the florist made it thirty. In its development there is some freshness. It is a laugh maker, well photographed and will amuse. It is a much better picture than the one it copies.

"THE BRAND" (American), May 30.—In this picture, Mr. Kerrigan is a sturdy, curly-headed young blacksmith, newly married. Miss Pauline Bush plays his wife. Mr. Richardson is the perfume salesman who comes to town just when the young wife, a city woman, begins to be bored with the country. The young smith in his fury heats a branding iron and, finding the salesman in his home, presses it against his face. It is so well acted and so effectively produced that the impression that it leaves is very deep. It is a very vivid, real picture. The situation isn't pleasant, of course, but it is an extremely competent, praiseworthy picture. The camera work is fine.

"TWO FOOLS THERE WERE" (Gaumont), May 26.—Two men were friends and lived together in the country. A woman was hurt in an automobile accident and brought to their house. There was a third man outside of the picture; but she was a flirt and the two fools quarreled on account of her. The father of the woman and her fiance came and took her away, while the two fools were gunning for each other. This is merely the outline statement. The situation is very cleverly handled and well acted. The scenes are beautiful interiors and glimpses of a fine country dwelling, woods, fields and wide views. All photographs are excellent.

"THE REWARD OF VALOR" (American), May 27.—This picture opens with a wide view over a pretty Western valley. Excellent artistic scenes very well photographed, is one of the qualities the spectator will at once notice. Their high quality holds throughout the film. It is a well acted love story, in which Miss Pauline Bush is the girl and Mr. Kerrigan, as a "college mountaineer," is her choice. Mr. Richardson, as an English lordling, is her father's choice. The girl's brother, a new player who will please, helps out the love match. It is brought about by the old "hold-up" that scares the dude and makes the mountaineer seem a "hero." The picture stands by its lovely scenes rather than by its story; but it is sure to please.

"A MESSAGE FROM BEYOND" (Solax), May 29.—A semi-mystical picture that, in its ending, suggests "The Return of Peter Grim." The story is nothing like the play mentioned; but a dear old grandmother's ghost appears and, although not seen by her grandson, helps him out of a grievous difficulty. The old lady's son had become successful and had married a snobbish woman who didn't like the old-fashioned and not very presentable grandmother. The granddaughter was like her mother; but the grandson was different and proved himself worthy of her affection. The picture aims at sentiment. It is well acted and photographed and hits the mark fairly well. Its only marked weakness comes from a little obscurity. The grandson was too abruptly introduced.

"HIS MOTHER'S SON" (Reliance), June 1.—A picture illustrating the life of a man who happens to be a poet, from childhood through a weak and sorrowful young manhood and its love story. The acting is, in part good, and the photography is good. It is the weakest Reliance picture we have seen in over a long year. There is little truth in the way it has developed its situation and it has little or no significance. We do not believe that many people will find entertainment in it. It seems to us very poor.

"THE WHITE BROTHER'S TEXT" (Powers), May 28.—A story of a little scraggling settlement in a dusty corner of the West. The Indian preacher, because he is an Indian, is driven from the town by the cowpunchers. Later, it is shown with some dramatic vividness that the Indian has sincerely learned the white man's text, "Forgive thine enemies." Bad Jack, now in need of a friend finds that the text is good. The backgrounds are very wild and very interesting. The picture isn't thrilling, but is human, clear and smoothly conducted. The photography is very fair.

"JUST A BOY" (Solax), May 31.—A very well photographed and interesting study of life as it is exemplified by genus homo, species street-Arab. The picture has a good deal of truth. We see the kid first on the street "wid de gang," and later see him after he has been adopted by a rich lady. He steals back his old rags to go out on the street again. "He licked the mut what called him sissy," and once more he was free to enjoy life. The Solax Kid deserves commendation for good acting. It makes a good release. It is well photographed.

"THE PERIL" (Imp), May 30.—In making this picture of a melodramatic story, dealing with military life, the Imp people have heightened its convincing power by scenes taken at the Presidio, showing the fortress with its guns and the garrison. The story is of a love match between a lieutenant (King Baggot) and the daughter of the colonel (Violet Horner). A Japanese spy is in the colonel's service as a servant (Mr. Daly). Because the lieutenant drinks, the colonel (Mr. Shay) objects to him. The lieutenant and the girl plan an elopement and, while attempting this, the young officer comes upon the spy. There is a very tensely conducted and convincing struggle in the colonel's library. The whole picture convinces. It is well acted, terse, and very well set and photographed. It is a picture that will be liked, a first class melodrama.

"A RANCH WOMAN" (Champion), May 27.—A picture of wild life, conducted and photographed so that the story flows impetuously, especially as to the first half; but it is speedily told all the way through. It is a thorough-going melodrama; but it has plenty of good quality and is interesting. The acting of most of the characters is very natural, often very commendable indeed. The camera work in the first half is perfect; it is very fair all through.

"FEATHERTOP" (Eclair), May 28.—The Eclair people are doing very commendable work in their representations from the masterpieces of American literature. This is an adaptation of Hawthorne's sketch, "Feathertop," and gives the adventures of a scarecrow to whom a witch gave life for as long as he should continue smoking. It is a satyrical comedy in the costume of Puritan days. Its meaning is quite clear and will be popular. The acting, sets, costumes and camera work are all good. We think it a very worthy release. It is so distinctly fresh and so clever that it will probably be welcomed heartily.

"THE SHERIFF OUTWITTED" (Nestor), June 1.—One of the secrets of the freshness nearly always found in Nestor pictures, even these Westerns, is the skill with which, not only interesting, but appropriate backgrounds are chosen and given a place in the story. They are also enacted naturally, all speedy action is done at breakneck pace. As in this picture, the stories are also usually well laid out. Not much time is wasted with unimportant scenes, actions or characters that do not influence the real heart of the story, the truly vital part on which it depends for its strongest interest. They are love stories, and it is a truism to remark that these, when well acted and convincing, are always fresh. Add to these qualities vivid photography and one reason for their popularity is found. Betty Keller and Lee Moran play the leads in this love story in which the sheriff, who also loves the girl, is kept from arresting the true lover, who has just shot his man in self-defense.

"THE APACHE BALL" (Lux), May 31.—Parisian Apaches are the under world hoodlums and the Apache ball was given by gentle folk who came dressed in the costume of street roughs. Two of the real article saw in the papers that the ball was to be held and attended. They were a big success both socially and financially, but their sense of humor suggested to them to have the other guests arrested as Apaches. They are brought to justice in the end. The camera work is good; but the situation is too slight to be very effective.

"ARABELLA WORKS TOO HARD" (Lux), May 31.—On the same reel is this Arabella farce. She gets a job at a house where the former servant had been too slow. Arabella works too fast and furiously; the cops are called to save the household furniture. Arabella's comical looks and behavior are very amusing. The camera work is good.

"HEROES OF THE BLUE AND GREY" (Champion), May 29.—Two friendly old soldiers get into a hot discussion over some battle of the war in which they had been on opposite sides, and the result is a falling out. One had a son and the other a daughter (Evelyn Francis) who were sweethearts. Both the old soldiers have dream-memories of war scenes and a battle around a house, which is very good indeed, a real thriller. The picture lives for these battle scenes; but they are skilfully used, with the Memorial Day scenes that follow, to make an effective story. The picture has a few short-comings; the leaders are in very bare verse, for one instance; but it has quality and will be generally liked. The photographs are very fair.

"THE SOLDIER'S LAST CALL" (Republic), May 28.—A picture taken at the New York Military Academy, at Cornwall, N. Y. The story is not about this school or its cadets, as such. Its chief characters are two old veterans, one of the blue, one of the grey, who live in the neighborhood. The cadets appear, separately as well as in formation and there's a sham battle with volley firing and rushes under the smoke. One of the old soldiers, almost ready to die, thinks the sham battle real, and leads the boys to victory, and dies. At the grave, his old comrade, and one time opponent, blows taps and also dies over the mound. The picture is successful in its appeal and will be liked. The scenes are well photographed and some are very pretty. One doesn't find old soldiers wearing the G. A. R. hats in a poor house though.

GEORGE W. PETERS JOINS AMERICAN FORCES.

George W. Peters, formerly of the Selig Polyscope Co., has joined the forces of the American Film Mfg. Co. Mr. Peters bears the reputation of being one of the best motion picture camera experts in the country. Of the several photographers who obtained pictures of the sinking of the Maine, Mr. Peters is generally considered the best. He is an ex-newspaper man, having handled the camera for such publications as the New York Journal, Chicago Examiner and American, Chicago Tribune, Denver Post, etc.

WARNING!

IF YOU DO NOT READ THIS THE LAW WILL NOT EXCUSE YOU

Everyone who has had experience with patents, knows that it takes many months to secure the final papers from the U. S. Patent Office. They also know that when the claims are many and broad it is frequently found necessary to divide claims and apply for two or more patents, in order to obtain the best protection. This applies to our application for patents covering the construction and appliances of our Perfection Concave Screen, every feature of which is thoroughly covered by application for patents, which we have every reason to believe will all be granted.

The cause of this article is, that we have been informed by our representatives and friends, from time to time, that several parties have taken it into their heads that concave screens are the proper things to use, and are attempting to confiscate our ideas to their own use by building their own screens and are trying to induce others to share their liability to prosecution for infringement by offering free information on

HOW TO BUILD CONCAVE SCREENS CHEAP.

This proceeding if not stopped would work a double injury to us. In addition to the infringement, it would have a tendency to introduce a lot of worthless concave screens made in a haphazard manner, that would throw the whole scientific principle of the Perfection Concave Screen into disrepute.

As the name of our Company would indicate, we are interested in many patents and inventions and know our rights in these matters, and are not spending our money in publishing these assertions as an idle bluff, and to all such persons who have, or who are contemplating the building of screens along the lines of our descriptions in advertisements of perfection concave screens, we hereby notify them that we shall prosecute all infringements to the fullest extent immediately upon receipt of our final patents papers.

To others who have no intention of building concave screens for themselves but who may have gained the impression that to manufacture the concave screen correctly, is a cheap proposition, allow us to say that our expenses for expert, scientific and mechanical services and experimental tests were over $5,000.00 before we placed the first screen on the market and that a concave screen that is not made mathematically correct to fit the conditions of the picture which it is to reproduce, taking into consideration size, distance of throw and angle of light, will show a more distorted picture and with greater eye strain than when thrown on a flat screen. We have spent our money to overcome this and have passed the experimental stage.

We move into new, large manufacturing quarters this week and no one will manufacture screens of like quality cheaper than we, even if they knew how and had the facilities for doing so. Our screens are all made to order to fit the conditions of the stage for which they are intended, and are sold according to size.

Send us description of your requirements and allow us to quote you.

MAKING PHOTOPLAYS IN EGYPT (June 10).—The picture opens with Miss Gene Gauntier just finishing a scenario. The next scene shows the director, Mr. Sid Olcott, reading the script to the assembled company. Later the director, with his interpreter, Ameen, arrives at a point ten miles from Luxor, where they meet the Sheik of a tribe of Arabs, and secure locations and assistance. In the meantime, the individual members of the company are visiting the different shops in Luxor in an endeavor to secure appropriate costumes. The next morning the entire company is on its way. They arrive at an Arab village on the desert and get busy "making up" for their various parts. Miss Gauntier is seen working industriously to master the art of balancing a jug of water on her head, in accordance with the custom of the Arab women. The operator loads his camera with film, and the director sings out, "All ready!" Now for the instructions! The director and his motley company of dusky Arabian supernumeraries have slight differences about various matters but through the aid of Ameen, things are smoothed out and the rehearsal proceeds. After the scenes for the day are all taken, we find the company washing up and preparing to return. We see the director settling with the Arabs, and saying goodbye, all start off on a weary ten-mile donkey ride to Luxor.

THE GUN SMUGGLERS (June 12).—Steven Jarrow, engaged in smuggling arms across the border, keeps the secret from his son, Logan. Valdez, the Mexican colonel, in charge of the Federal troops stationed there, has a very pretty daughter, with whom Logan is deeply in love. A gun smuggling expedition is planned. Federal headquarters receive warning and Colonel Valdez determines to annihilate the smugglers. During the action Logan's father is killed and it devolves upon Col. Valdez to convey the sad news to Logan. The young man, not knowing of his father's career, and believing his death was caused by unfair means, swears vengeance against his sweetheart's father. However, he is saved from becoming a murderer by the cool-headedness of the brave colonel. John Bridge, one of the smugglers who managed to escape, is crazed by the death of his comrades and seeks to avenge them by taking the life of Colonel Valdez. Logan is arrested for the crime, but is cleared through the instrumentality of Bridge's wife.

THE GIRL STRIKERS (June 14).—Kotton, Sr., takes a vacation, leaving his son in charge of the factory. Shortly after the departure of his father, Kotton, Jr., hears a complaint against the foreman. This is no sooner adjusted than the girls demand higher wages and fewer hours, and Koton, Jr., indicates his approval.

Returning from his vacation, Kotton, Sr., learns of the increase in wages and declares that the old scale will prevail. This order is followed by a strike.

Kotton, Jr., leaves his father's house and factory through sympathy with the strikers and marries one of the former employees. A year later he is discovered in his humble home and he is now a happy and proud parent. Kotton, Sr., having heard of the birth of his son's heir, calls to see the baby. He becomes so impressed with the grandchild that he adjusts the differences with his son and progressive measures are instituted at the factory.

EDISON.

TEN DAYS WITH A FLEET OF U. S. BATTLESHIPS (June 11).—This film depicts the daily routine of sailor life aboard ship. The scenes cover the entire ship from aloft and below and from stem to stern. Certain views showing a physical drill muster of marines, inspection of arms, sending a semaphore message and sentencing delinquents to punishment, all play an important part in the attractiveness of this film and are equally as interesting as the wonderful mechanism of the great ship.

An imposing scene showing the captain addressing his officers and crew assembled on the quarter deck will give a fair conception of the number aboard ship. A stirring view taken aboard the U. S. Minnesota shows the hoisting of the morning colors and stars and stripes are unfurled on high, to the martial air of the Star Spangled Banner.

The scenic end of this picture is superb. One scene in particular, a fragment of beauty stolen from the gigantic Atlantic, pictures the sun shining on the water making a brilliant network over the ocean in dancing shadows of black and gold. The fleet steaming through this beauty forms a picturesque background like a silhouette against the sky. Another striking scene shows a flock of sea gulls hovering over the water in search of food, some skimming along the surface and others rising on the crest of a swelling billow.

THE ANGEL AND THE STRANDED TROUPE (June 12).—A fly-by-night dramatic company playing all the "tank towns" on the map, finally comes to grief in Farm City, where they play to the smallest house of the season, receiving only four dollars and thirty cents gross. Having no money with which to pay their hotel bill or railroad transportation they are left high and dry at the mercy of a hard-hearted landlord who refuses to serve them any more meals until money is forthcoming.

In the leading lady's room they hold council as to what course to follow. Finally the comedian, having discovered the hotel proprietor's fondness for the game of poker, suggests that they pool what little money they have left, give it to him and he will engage the proprietor in a game and thus enable him to win sufficient money to defray their hotel bill. This is agreed upon and accordingly a little game is started in the private office. The heavy villain occasionally pokes in his head and reports the progress of the game to the others. At first the comedian wins and the outlook is bright, but the tide turns and the comedian loses and is finally cleaned out. The actors are now worse off than ever and at their wits' end. The leading man has meanwhile made the acquaintance of Squire Mudge, a venerable and benevolent townsman who invites him and "a friend or two" to dinner. Quickly returning to the hotel the leading man imparts the joyful information to the rest of the company that at last a square meal is in sight. They lose no time in taking advantage of the offer and are soon seated in the Squire's dining room enjoying a hearty repast.

Upon returning to the hotel that night they face a new complication: the cruel hearted proprietor now refuses them even a bed. However, they make the best of the situation by sleeping in the hotel office where the following morning the good Squire hearing of their dire straits, settles their hotel bill and at the depot supplies them with transportation home and in gratitude the ladies of the company hug and kiss him to the utter disgust of the angry wife who happens upon the scene at that moment and soundly reprimands him while the happy actors are waving goodbye from the rear platform of the departing train.

THE PRISONER OF WAR (June 14).—Our first introduction to the Emperor of France (Napoleon) is just at the moment when he is bidding farewell to the land he loves so dearly as he is sailing away, a prisoner on board the "Bellerophon" bound for the Island of St. Helena. We are shown his landing at St. Helena and where he was lodged for the first night. The next we see of the captive is in his room at "Longwood," where he spent nearly five sad, long years; we are shown how well he was guarded and restricted, his quarrels with Sir Hudson Low, his jailor, and the trick he played upon his guards.

Emperor once, he is now but a broken, gloomy old man, brooding by the fire from which visions of the past arise. Memories of his only son are brought to him by the sight of other children around him. We are thus shown the great military leader who once played with thousands of lives across the checkerboard of Europe.

A terrific storm broke along the coast of St. Helena one bleak, cold day and at sunset Napoleon's star of destiny sank to rise no more except over the dome of the Hotel des Invalides in Paris, which rears its noble pillars in honor of the great man who lies there, wrapped in the silence of his glory.

HOW FATHER ACCOMPLISHED HIS WORK (June 15).—A hard working father finds it next to impossible to find a room where he can concentrate his thoughts. His mother-in-law's squeaking parrot drives him from the sitting-room, to his bedroom, where he gets into trouble because of his wife's pet dog and entering another room where all seems quiet he is interrupted by his two daughters who come in and scrape ragtime on the violin. Again he removes his account books, this time to his son's room, where he is about to enjoy peace and quiet when the son begins his usual exercise on the punching bag.

In utter disgust he returns to his bedroom where at last he finds quiet, his wife having retired for the night. He manages to put in two hours when he is again annoyed by the dog. It is almost midnight, but he determines to finish the work and decides to try the sitting-room once more. Here, however, he encounters a hungry tramp who has entered the house for the purpose of obtaining food.

A bright plan now enters the old man's head; he transforms the tramp into a burglar and loads him down with the parrot and cage, the musical instruments of torture, not forgetting the pesky dog, slips him a ten dollar bill and thrusts an empty revolver into his hand. Shouting for help he arouses the household who see the burglar making a getaway with their beloved pets and musical instruments, while father laughs up his sleeve with assurance that in the future he will be able to make up his accounts undisturbed.

KITTY'S HOLD-UP (June 15).—Kitty has two sisters and they are all invited to an informal dance. Flo and Becky get ready to go, but Kitty feigns illness and when their escorts arrive they leave Kit behind. They are no sooner gone than Kitty slips to her brother's room during his absence and puts on a suit of his clothes, intending to play a joke on her sisters and friends. She looks stunning as a college boy, and upon arriving at the dance takes her hostess into her confidence and is introduced around to all the dancers.

The disguise is perfect and Kitty has the time of her life. All the boys are jealous of this "new chap," who flirts with all the girls and whom the girls take to so readily.

When Kitty gets home she decides that she will give her sisters a scare. Flo and Becky are surprised when they get to their rooms to discover that Kitty is not about. While they are engaged in looking they hear a sound at the window and when they go to it, up pops the head of a burglar. A policeman sees him come in the window and rescues the two sisters. The burglar suddenly commences to beg and throw off his disguise and lo and behold, it's no other than Kitty. The tables being turned Beck and Flo in all seriousness tell the policeman "to do his duty." Kitty begs good and hard, and the others relenting, the policeman goes and Kitty gets a good shaking from the two sisters, and also promises "never again" for practical jokes.

VITAGRAPH.

LULU'S DOCTOR (June 10).—John Lewis, a rising young physician, is in love with Madge Marion. He gets an offer to share a practice in New York and proposes marriage. Madge consents. A few days later she receives news from her brother-in-law, Ben March, of her sister's death out West. Some months later Lewis writes he is coming down to marry her. At the same time she gets another letter from her brother-in-law, asking her to come out West and take care of his three-year-old little girl, Lulu. Madge decides to go out and asks John to postpone their marriage for two years. He thinks it is a sign that she does not want him, and says that she must take him now or not at all. Madge determines to go West and they part in anger.

After three years March resolves to come East and sends Madge and Lulu, now seven, to New York ahead of him. As fate will have it, they take rooms on the same street with Lewis, who is now a prosperous doctor. Madge goes out one day leaving Lulu alone. The child breaks her doll and sets out to find a doctor to cure it. She wanders into Lewis' office and he is much struck by her quaintness. Madge returns and is terrified to find Lulu gone. She sets out to find her and is directed to Lewis' office by a policeman who saw her enter there. The lovers meet again and are brought together by Lulu. Lewis confesses his fault and asks Madge again to be his wife, and she consents.

PANDORA'S BOX (June 11).—John Bunny and Henry Shayshall are attacked with "amoritis" the moment they step into Amander Witherspoon's boarding house. Henry falls in love with Flora Finnee, the "star boarder," and makes up his mind to impress her with his belated affections. He timidly places a box of perfume in front of her door. Flora simultaneously is inspired with a similar desire. Pendora, the maid of all work, sees the boxes at the entrance of Henry's and Flora's rooms. She cannot restrain her inquisitiveness and opens them. She hears some one coming and in her confusion, places Flora's gift on the door knob of Amander's room and the box which Flora had sent Henry in front of John's room.

This creates jealousy and confusion when Amander shows Flora the beautiful present she has received from John, and John shows Henry the gift with which he has been presented, as coming from Flora. The cause of the trouble is finally traced to Fandora, and to make sure, Henry and Flora decide to confirm their suspicions. They place a box filled with mice where it will come under the notice of the maid. This arouses her curiosity when she sees it. She cannot refrain from investigating, opens the box, freeing the mice, which causes her to give vent to a series of screams that brings everybody to the scene of the commotion. Fandora is "caught with the goods" and the landlady summarily dismisses her. Flora and Henry are united in love's consoling embrace and bid a "day-day" to the mischief-maker.

YELLOW BIRD (June 12).—Disregarding the sanctity of "Song Bird's" feelings, John Strong, a young surveyor in the pioneer forests of the West, makes love to the Indian maiden whenever he chances to meet her, until she longs and looks for his coming and going, and finds that he has made himself part of her life. She learns shortly afterwards that Strong has a wife and child. Her heart bleeds for revenge when she is scorned by the man whom she trusted. She tells Chief Kahgahgee, her father, when he asks her the cause of her sadness, the story of the treatment she has received from Strong. The Chief swears she shall be revenged. "Song Bird" tells him where Strong's home is and he stealthily approaches the shack of the white man, where he beholds him and his wife, with their little child, who is fair-haired and bears a peculiar birth mark upon its arms. Waiting his opportunity, Kahgahgee steals the child, takes it to his tepee and "Song Bird" brings it up as her own, calling the little one "Yellow Bird."

Twenty years later, John Strong, now a widower, meets "Yellow Bird," recognizes her by her golden hair and the mark upon her arm, and tries to per suade her to return with him to his home. She does not know him and clings to "Song Bird," the only mother she has ever known, happy to be with her and the young Indian Brave to whom she is bethrothed. Strong calls upon the law to gain possession of his child, but being of age, she is at liberty to chose for herself, and remains with the people of her adoption.

Strong returns to his lonely shack and meditatively ponders over his past folly, silently accepting the visitation of his indiscretions in loneliness and remorse.

THE LIGHT THAT FAILED (June 14).—Mrs. Harding, wife of the President of the City Electric Company, insists upon her husband buying a chateau in France, where she and her daughter can spend the European season. Harding pleads a lack of means, and his wife suggests that he cut down the wages of his employees 10 per cent., and secure the purchase price of the chateau. The men object to this reduction when this notice is posted and Ben Quinn, foreman of the power house, as a representative of the workmen, calls upon Mr. Harding at his home, and protests. Mrs. Harding arrogantly denounces him as presumptious to question their right and privilege.

Ben Quinn's little daughter Nell, playing on the streets, has her skull fractured by a lineman of the City Electric Company dropping a hammer upon her head. Ben is notified of the accident. He hastens there from the meeting of his fellow-mechanics and carries his daughter home, where the doctor discovers she is not dead, but it will be necessary to take her to a hospital and perform the operation of trephining to remove a small bone pressing upon her brain. Alice Harding, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harding, hears of the accident and offers to pay the expense of the operation out of her own pocket. Ben accepts her offer as a loan.

During the delicate surgical performance, the employees of the City Electric Company are holding a consultation and bitterly denounce their employer as unjust and unreasonable. Ben, whose bitterness is more intense, owing to the accident to his daughter, decides upon extreme measures, to cut the wires and shut off the electric lights of the city. Ben, with his own hands, commits the act. As he does so, the doctor is at the most critical point of the operation upon his little girl, and when the lights go out, the operating room is left in complete darkness and he cannot complete it. The child dies, a victim of irrational obstinacy.

DAYS OF TERROR (June 15).—Under the guise of the French Revolutionists' cause, Jaques, a revolutionary spy, tries to gain the love of the Duchess of De Berac. She repudiates his advances and denounces his effrontery. The Duke De Berac's mansion is stormed by the belligerents and all the inmates are taken prisoners, including the duke and duchess. After they are taken to prison, Jaques, seeing an opportunity of getting the duchess within his power, offers to gain the pardon of her husband if she will consent to become his paramour. For the sake of her husband she consents to this, although she despises Jaques as she would a snake. The duke's pardon is granted and given to the duchess. When she hands her husband his pardon, he becomes suspicious; learning the price which his wife is asked to pay for it, and the despicable conduct of the spy, he tears the pardon in pieces and throws it at Jaques' face.

Annette, a member of the Revolutionists, who is in love with Jaques, is infuriated when she discovers that he would cast her off for another; she kills him. On the day of the execution, the duchess is given permission to bid her husband farewell before his death. When husband and wife come together and she assures him of her love and the reason for agreeing to sacrifice herself for him, he takes her to his bosom, and hand in hand they go to the guillotine, constant to the end and inseparable in death.

LUBIN.

A WINDY DAY (June 10).—Teddy Blow is conscious that a stiff wind is blowing. His hat goes off and, after being chased by a crowd, it gets under a wagon and is ruined. It then begins to rain. As he opens his umbrella it carries him up in the air. Finally it turns, dropping Blow through the skylight of a room where an elderly spinster is at breakfast. She jumps to detain him, but he escapes. A gust of wind catches him and blows him against the wall, flattening him. A billposter is about to paste a bill over him when an old maid protests. She peels him off the wall, rolls him up and takes him home, where, with the aid of an air pump, she inflates him to the normal size again. Then he rises to the ceiling. The old maid pulls him down, but again he sails upward and escapes through the ceiling. An the street he sails upward and gets entangled in the telegraph wires. He is rescued by a line-man. He is again pursued, and, dashing around a corner, meets a boy with a bellows. He secures the wind machine, blows the policeman away and sends a street car backwards. Finally he wakes up in bed and discovers that a wind fan has been blowing on his face.

FIRE AND STRAW (June 12).—Mary Light, the minister's daughter, expresses a wish to become a settlement worker. Her father, the Rev. Alfred Light, consents and permits his daughter to go, placing her under the charge of Mrs. Block. Mrs. Block resigns and Mary is placed in charge. She visits a rendezvous for toughs, called "Jake's Place," and there meets Jack Burr, a wicked, but handsome young man. Mary's heart thumps while she is under his gaze, and she falls in love. Jack seeing that he has impressed her, resolves to take advantage. Jack calls at her office with wicked intentions, but soon realizes that he loves her and confesses it. Mary refuses to listen, but tells him that if he really loves her he must reform and, although he promises, he finds the task too hard toward that end. On another visit to his place, Mary overhears Jack planning to commit a robbery. She goes to her father for advice, but he is at a loss. Then an idea occurs to her. Taking her father with her, she goes to the president of the firm and succeeds in getting permission to try their plan. Mary dresses in a flowing white robe, leaves her hair loose and gets inside of the vault, leaving the door ajar while the president and minister hide under a table. In a few minutes Jack and his pal enter, and drawing the shades, light a light, which falls upon the vault. They are surprised to see the vault open and when Jack opens the door he sees Mary pointing her finger at him. Thinking it to be an apparition, the two burglars rush from the office. The next morning Jack relates his experience to Mary and swears that he will reform. Two months later Mary is seen at her home and Jack, neatly dressed, brings a bouquet. He shows her a letter from his employer, informing him of a promotion. He asks Mary if she will accept him, which she does.

AN INDIAN'S GRATITUDE (June 13).—Ralph Mason, a clerk in the office of the Mining Company, headed by Mr. Cullen, is in financial straits, having gambled and lost. He sees an opportunity one day to steal money from the cash drawer, and hide his trail by making a false entry in the cash book of the cashier, John Forbes. The money thus gained, however, goes after that which has gone before. Returning from the gambling table, Ralph overhears Mr. Cullen send Forbes to the bank to get a check for $1,000 cashed. Ralph follows John as the latter starts for the bank. Coming to a secluded place in the woods, Ralph arms himself with a big stick, and, his face concealed by a large handkerchief, awaits the cashier. As John, on his way back to the office with the money, passes the place where Ralph is hiding, he receives a stunning blow which knocks him senseless. Ralph gets the money and fearful of having it found upon his person, hides it in a nearby ruin till he can with safety take it away again. He is seen, however, by an Indian whom he has ill-treated, and whom John has befriended, and after John leaves, the Indian gets the money. In the meantime, John and Ralph return by separate routes to the office, where they are employed, and John reports the theft. Mr. Cullen is suspicious and Ralph takes advantage to accuse John of having embezzled the money, and shows the false entries in the cash book which he himself had made. Mary Cullen, who is in love with John, is present and expersses her belief in the latter's innocence. Her father sends her home, while he investigates the situation. The sheriff is sent for and John is to be arrested. In the meantime the Indian has accidently seen Mary and told her of the pocketbook and how he saw it hidden by Ralph. Mary quickly grasps the Indian's arm and hurries with him back to the office where the truth comes out, John is vindicated and Ralph gets what is coming to him.

HER GIFT (June 15).—This story opens with the wedding of Dorothy Gray to John Gregory. Their union is idealy happy and a child is born. Not long after this event, John is caught in an unfortunate cotton deal and is obliged to borrow fifty thousand dollars from a supposed friend. This man is a banker, David Elton, and, unknown to John, has endeavored to make love to Dorothy. The money is borrowed on a call note for three days. The night before it is due, Dorothy, not knowing the state of affairs, gives a ball. The banker being one of the guests, John asks him for an extension, which is refused. This conversation is overheard by Dorothy. She is stunned, but rallying from the shock, decides to find a way out of the difficulty. She sends for a diamond broker, who lends her the necessary amount, and she goes to the bank and lifts the note, being very heavily veiled to avoid recognition. As she leaves, the banker enters and, catching a glimpse of her, questions the clerk. All he knows is that a "woman" has paid the amount and lifted the note. Suspecting an entanglement, he writes to the wife. She, pretending ignorance, shows the letter to John. He is nonpulsed and after enjoying his discomfiture for a bit, Dorothy tells him of the truth. In the meantime, the government has announced a shortage in the cotton crop, which sends John's stock soaring, and he clears up a tidy fortune.

ESSANAY.

THE MIS-SENT LETTER (June 11).—Isaac Silverman, a jeweler, takes unto himself a new and lovely wife who he finds is extremely jealous, particularly of stage ladies. Unfortunately, Silverman's sister and her daughter, both on the stage, now arrive in the city to play an engagement. Knowing of Uncle Isaac, Sarah writes him a letter enclosing her photo and asking for $100. Silverman gets it at the breakfast table and instantly wifie's suspicions are aroused. After reading, he tears up the letter to prevent her reading, secretly pockets the photo and hikes for the office. Wifie manages to piece the torn letter together and instantly has hysterics. At the office Silverman receives a letter from a jewelry firm dunning him for payment of a bill. He writes an answer, also pens a note to Sarah enclosing the photo back again and a check for $100. Of course the letters are put in the wrong envelopes and the jewelry firm receive the check and photo while Sarah receives information that her Uncle cannot pay his bill. The clerk discovers the error, tells Silverman and he rushes to the jewelry firm, only to be told that if he doesn't settle at once they will send the check and photo to his wife. Silverman departs in a rage and they laugh over their joke. But the joke is reversed when the stenographer really sends the check and photo to Mrs. Silverman through another mistake. Things look black for poor Silverman until he meets his sister and Sarah, who persuade him to take them home and introduce his new wife. In despair he does so and prospects are bright once more when wifie learns their relationship and begs forgiveness for her unreasonable jealousy.

THE HONEYBUGS' FIRST QUARREL (June 13).—Mr. and Mrs. Honeybug are the most contented couple in the world until he discovers one morning that she wears false curls. This is enough, and he angrily leaves the house. After a good cry, Mrs. Honeybug decides to go home to her folks, writes hubby a letter saying she is going home to someone handsomer than he (meaning her father), and leaves. Hubby receives the note, and, of course, becomes insanely jealous. He rushes home, finds wifie gone, hastens to a telegraph office, sends a wire to the station agent to detain young woman with false curls, weight one hundred and twenty pounds and that it is an elopement case. Now the agent heroically tries to carry out instructions and manages to corrall several young ladies answering the description, including an Italian girl and a couple of real elopers. A crowd gathers, and the agent is having the time of his life trying to prevent a riot of the outraged husbands, etc., when Mr. Honeybug arrives on the scene and despairingly declares wifie is not among the collection. The angry women turn from the agent to him and he is in hot water when suddenly wifie enters with her suitcase, followed by her parents, and matters are straightened out satisfactorily to all concerned.

THE PASSING SHADOW (June 14).—Frisco Sam, a tramp, attempts to secure a drink of water at a farmhouse one morning and is brutally kicked off the place by the son of the owner and one of the hands. Swearing vengeance Frisco limps off down the road and meets a little crippled girl, who smiling offers him a luscious apple. Thanking her with a grim smile, he goes on to his camp. Here he finds an old newspaper and learns that his father, a wealthy physician, has died and attorneys are seeking him. He beats his way to the city, proves his identity to the attorneys and finds he has been left a fortune of $50,000. Possessed with but one thought of revenge on the rustics who mistreated him, Parsons now prepares his plans. Meanwhile, Farmer Rankin is told by the old family doctor that it is necessary for him to send his little crippled child to the city for an operation. Rankin realizes he hasn't the money and the outlook is indeed dark. But a letter received from his lawyer crushes him in despair. It tells that the mortgage on his farm has been taken over by a stranger from New York, who threatens immediate foreclosure unless payment is made next day at noon. The following morning the new owner arrives in the person of Parsons. The former tramp refuses to listen to any pleas for mercy, reveals his identity and declares his vengeance has come. Rankin finally starts for town to try and raise the sum needed. Striding through the house, Parsons suddenly comes upon the little crippled child and recognizes her as the angel who gave him the apple in his distress. He becomes interested in her fairy book and learns she must go to the city for an operation her father cannot afford. Her sweet, pathetic little face wipes out all thoughts of vengeance from Parsons' heart and he becomes the noblest of God's creatures —a man. A moment only he struggles with himself, then tiptoes from the room with her fairy book in hand, writes out a check to cover the operation expense and pins it, together with the surrendered mortgage, to a leaf in the fairy book. Laying the book in the hands of the sleeping tot, he silently kisses one of her tangled curls and steals away.

WESTERN HEARTS (June 15).—Seth Perkins, a prospector, has two daughters, Mabel and Vedah. Vedah is a cripple, and the town doctor writes her father it will be necessary to operate to cure her and the expense will be one hundred dollars. Perkins has no such sum and is in despair. However, Vedah, determines to save the money needed. She and Mabel have a garden and sell their produce to the storekeeper. Mabel is vain and demands to be paid in material for frocks, ribbons, etc., while Vedah takes money as her share and hoards it carefully. Sam Hard, a young puncher, is in love with Mabel and it tears poor Vedah's heart to see her sister so happy while she is miserable. One day a note is shoved over the sheriff's door advising that Sam Hard is running a still in Coyote cave. A posse raids the cave and Sam is captured. He is led, manacled, past old Perkin's shack and is allowed to speak to Mabel, but she loftily declines to wait for him until he is released and returns his ring. After Sam is led away Vedah remonstrates with her sister for her cruelty and learns Sam will have to serve a prison sentence or pay a fine of $100. Thoughtfully she goes to her dresser drawer, takes out her money box and finds she has saved just that sum—enough to undergo the operation and cure her deformity. But her secret love for Sam causes her to make the greatest sacrifice of her life and she goes to the sheriff with the money and obtains Sam's release. Awakening to his true love, Sam asks her to become his wife, and the world smiles brightly again.

CINES.

A SOLDIER'S HEART (June 11).—Midst the terrific roar of the cannon and the murderous hail of rifle bullets, the gallant Italian sharpshooters leave their intrenchments and charge across the field toward the Arab camp. After a fierce conflict, including several desperate hand to-hand encounters, in which a number of both sides are slain, they succeed in putting the enemy to rout.

Many prisoners are taken, among whom is a little Arab girl, a pitiful object exposed to such great danger. The look of frightened appeal in her eyes touches the heart of a brave soldier lad, who insists upon taking her under his protection.

For several weeks the soldiers enjoy the company of the youngster, when one day the colonel appears and orders that the child be placed in the care of the Red Cross nurses.

This parting brings great sorrow to the soldier. The colonel comforts him in his distress, however, and commending him for bravery, tells him that his duty is to leave the child in better hands and go and fight his country's battles.

MESSINA AS IT IS TODAY (June 11).—A remarkable series of scenes showing the progress made in the rebuilding of Messina, where the terrible earthquake created such devastation. The views of the principal ruins, the fine harbor, the work of rebuilding, and the first tram cars in new Messina are extremely interesting.

LEAH, THE TELEPHONE GIRL (June 15).—"Hello, Hello," shouts the enraged colonel, but no response. This is because Leah, the prettiest girl at the switchboard, is too much engrossed in an interesting novel, and will not be interrupted.

His patience entirely exhausted, he marches over to the office of the company, and complains in loud terms. Consequently, Leah gets her walking papers.

The sight of the unhappy girl leaving the office in disgrace touches the kind heart of the colonel, and in order to assuage her grief, he offers to escort her home. On the way he is charmed with the beauty of the girl, and the result is that three months later they are married.

Leah proves a model wife, and her cheerful disposition is unruffled, except at times when she has occasion to use the 'phone, and having difficulty with the operator, pours out her latent wrath without restraint, entirely forgetting that she has been anything but perfection herself all her life.

VENICE, ITALY (June 15).—A most attractive travel subject, showing interesting sights of this beautiful city on canals, such as the Paglia and Rialto bridges, the celebrated St. Mark's Square, the Franchetti Palace, the Grand Canal, and some delightful moonlight effects on the Lagoon.

ECLIPSE.

PERCY'S FIRST CAMERA (June 12).—Percy really becomes an expert photographer, but unfortunately cannot keep out of trouble while securing his negatives. After an unusually successful day, he returns home to his laboratory to develop his plates, but unhappily is careless with his lighted cigarette. Fire breaks out, the fire department is called, and poor Percy is discovered under the ruins.

MAKING SILK HATS (June 12).—An instructive as well as interesting subject, showing how silk hats are made in one of the leading factories in London. The various operations include body making, shaping, lining and finishing, all of which are done with the utmost care by expert workmen.

THROUGH SASKATCHEWAN (June 12).—Saskatchewan covers an extensive area in the southwestern part of Canada. We are taken on a delightful railroad journey, during which we obtain an excellent view of the country.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 23, 1912 (June 3).—Newport News, Va. The greatest fighting craft in the world, the United States Battleship Texas, slides from the ways into the waters of the Chesapeake.

Bremen, Germany. The first trials for the Olympic Games bring out many likely candidates for the honor of representing Germany at the Copenhagen Stadium.

Portland, Ore. The First Infantry and the Twenty-fourth (colored) infantry, leave for service in the Hawaiian Islands.

Stratford-on-Avon, England. Great crowds and elaborate decorations mark the opening of the Shakespeare Anniversary, at the birthplace of the Bard of Avon.

Los Angeles, Cal. The Shriners take possession of the city and participate in a great parade, with many magnificent floats.

Constantinople, Turkey. The Sultan returns to his palace after witnessing a review of the National Cadets and the Second Lieutenants of his army.

New York, N. Y. The school children of the city participate in the fifth annual park fete.

Paris, France. The funeral of the late Mr. Brisson, president of the Chamber of Deputies, is attended with much pomp and ceremony.

Del Rio, Texas. The ranchmen on this side of the Rio Grande are driving their cattle across the river into the United States, to save them from confiscation by the Federal Army or the Revolutionists.

Paris, France. The new fashions in evening wraps and décolleté gowns are wonderful creations of the Parisian couturiers.

N. B.—This program subject to change without notice should any events of greater importance than the above occur after going to press.

ANY OL' CLOTHES? (June 12).—A servant girl sells some of her master's clothes to buy a hat. The clothes find their way to a second-hand clothing dealer, where they are purchased by Luke McGluke, who much to his amazement and delight, finds a roll of banknotes in one pocket. McGluke promptly gets stewed and hitting the high spots on the main thoroughfare is carefully examined by a policeman, who finds sewed into the pocket of his suit the name of the erstwhile owner, and promptly carries him to his supposed home, where a newly arrived cook believing him to be her master, aids the copper in putting him to bed. When Madame returns she is informed that her husband is sleeping off a "spidicated" morning and promptly leaves for her mother's. Her husband arriving about this time discovers a man in bed and decides to get a divorce. Complications are straightened out when the two meet in the hall and explanations follow. Incidentally Luke McGluke and the new cook are unceremoniously kicked out of the back door.

A REDSKIN'S APPEAL (June 13).—This is the tale of an Indian girl adopted by General Branson and raised to womanhood, and betrothed to his son Jack. Just before their marriage the Indian girl meets an educated Indian, who tells her the story of her life and the part General Branson played in the death of her father, with the result that she marries the Indian instead of Jack.

NIAGARA FALLS (June 15).—Magnificent views of the world's most famous cataract are presented with such beauty and fidelity that everyone who sees them will be carried away by the beauty and grandeur of this wonder of nature. The rapids above the falls on both the American and Canadian sides are shown; the American and Canadian falls; scenes at the base of the rocky precipice, over which the mighty waters pour; and other views showing a trip on the "Maid of the Mist" and the terrifying awfulness of the whirlpool, make this picture one long to be remembered.

C. G. P. C.

TRAP OF DEATH (June 11).—This is a story of the days of the feudal barons when possession was more than nine points of the law. A powerful feudal lord becomes infatuated with the daughter of one of his neighbors and has her carried off by his men, who are hotly pursued by the father of the damsel, who arrives at the castle just in time to prevent the execution of one of his faithful followers, who was carried off with the girl. Rapidly overpowering the vassals the robber-abron is taken prisoner and thrown into a vault, in which the floor above him descends and catches him in a death grip.

PEPITA'S ESCAPADES (June 14).—Pepita is a young girl more agile than beautiful and seeks adventures far and near in the little Spanish town in which she lives. The reader may be sure that Pepita finds adventures.

MELIES.

TWO LOVES (June 20).—Found by the side of their parents, who died from thirst in the desert, Mary and John, the little orphans, are adopted by different families. Seventeen years later John sets out to buy cattle and tired with his long ride, he stops at a ranch whose owners are two girls by the name of Mary and Meg. Falling in love with the handsome stranger they beg him to stay. His choice falls on Mary, to whom he becomes engaged, much to the disappointment of Meg, who loves him to distraction. A month later John receives a letter, which, falling from his pocket, is discovered by Meg, and to her surprise she learns that John's surname is the same as that of her partner Mary. She rushes to tell Mary of her find and they both consult the family Bible left by her dead mother, which settles beyond a doubt that John is Mary's long lost brother. Glad to have made this discovery in time, Mary kisses John and begs him to marry Meg, who loves him so well.

BIOGRAPH.

A TEMPORARY TRUCE (June 10).—Mexican Jim, a good-for-nothing of the mining camp, spends most of his time in the tavern of the little town. On this particular day, having drunk up more than usual, he quarrels with Jack Hardy, a young prospector. Jack, under other circumstances, would have disdainfully ignored Jim's drunken garble, but he felt in none too good a humor, for things were not prospering with him, and his young wife was growing homesick for the East. Hence Jack's temper was on tap and he made Jim the laughing-stock of the town by giving him a walloping. Jim vows to get even; but how? He carries off Jack's wife and leaves a derisive note for Jack, and another at the saloon, to the effect that the joke is turned. Jim has forcibly taken Jack's wife as far as an old deserted well-box in the hills, when Jack, who started after them, comes up and opens fire. Jim has the advantage for he is sheltered by the well-box, and furthermore, Jack is careful for fear of hitting his wife. This warfare does not last long because of an outbreak among the young Indian braves, who have started out to avenge the death of one of their tribe at the hands of a party of drunken cutthroats, so Jack and Jim form a truce to fight the common enemy.

NEIGHBORS (June 13).—Two families, both French and naturally excitable. The two wives were bicycle fiends. Daily spins along the boulevard were indulged in, each woman envious of the other. Each derided the other's graceful (?) riding. Things are ripe when they bumped into each other. A spill, a broken wheel; two irate women; two hubbies aroused to a fury, demanding satisfaction. Of course, you realize that the answer is a duel. There is a duel and the most exciting one ever precipitated.

KATCHEM KATE (June 13).—Kate was a laundry girl and grew very tired of the ironing-board. She aspired to greater things, and when she saw an advertisement in the newspaper of a school at which one might become a famous detective in a few short, inexpensive lessons, with a guarantee of being provided with mysteries and criminals enough to keep one busy, she jumped at it. Was she successful? Well, see the picture.

Among The Exhibitors.

Galveston, Tex.—Galveston Theater Company. Capitalized at $15,000. Incorporators: C. K. Jorgenson, L. A. Walker, A. L. Scudder.

Albia, Iowa.—The Pastime Theater here has secured a large tent which will be used for the summer season. The tent is commodious and has a seating capacity of 1,250 people. The stage is 32x24, ample room for performers to do good work. The seats are arranged so that the performance can be seen from any part of the big tent. To make it comfortable and pleasant a large number of electric lights and electric fans will be placed in the tent, and a good orchestra will furnish delightful music.

Omaha, Neb.—A new moving picture theater will be erected here at Douglas and 16th Streets. It will be known as the Starland Palace.

Logan, W. Va.—Charles Bennett and W. J. Campbell will erect a new theater here at a cost of $10,000; seating capacity 700.

RELIANCE.

UNCLE HIRAM VISITS WASHINGTON (June 5).—Uncle Hiram, a countryman, makes his first visit to the national capital. He arrives at the station, visits the equestrian statue of General Wm. Tecumseh Sherman, sees the Washington Monument, and is surprised at its height of 555 feet. He sees the capitol from the top of this monument. He goes into the treasury, where he meets Lee McClung, treasurer of the United States, who shows him $10,000 in gold, then forty million dollars in ten thousand-dollar gold certificates. He is shown a receipt for the largest single money transaction in the world. Leaving the treasury he sees the White House; the statue of Andrew Jackson; takes a walk along Pennsylvania Avenue and sees the Library of Congress. Coming to the White House, Uncle Hiram sees the members of the president's cabinet leaving, and recognizes Secretary Meyer of the Navy, Secretary Wilson of Agriculture, Secretary Stimson of War, Secretary Hitchcock. Postmaster-General, Secretary Nagel of Commerce and Labor, Secretary Fisher of the Interior, and Attorney-General Wickersham of the United States. Uncle Hiram recognizes Admiral George Dewey, and is shown the guns the admiral captured at Manila. He sees Major-general Leonard Wood, chief of the staff United States Army. Within the White House are shown the executive offices: the East Room (this is the first motion picture ever showing the interior of the East Room). Interior of the president's office; W. M. Pennell, the president's private doorkeeper; Rudolph Foster, assistant secretary to the president, and Major Thomas L. Rhodes, the successor to Major Archibald Butt, martyred hero of the Titanic. Outside the White House, Uncle Hiram sees two of the president's body guard mounted on motor cycles. Then he catches a glimpse of the president himself leaving the White House. Having seen all there was to see in the city, Uncle Hiram leaves for home.

KAINTUCK (June 8).—Kaintuck is a big mountaineer. He loves his sweetheart, Sue, with his whole simple, honest heart. One day an artist comes to sketch in their vicinity. He is immediately struck by Sue's beauty and asks permission to use her as his model. Kaintuck is not pleased with the idea, but the girl consents. When the artist secures board in Sue's home, Kaintuck's jealousy knows no bounds. One day he sees the artist posing Sue, and noticing that the man's arms are about the girl, he desides that she loves him. But the artist thinks only of Sue as a model, his heart being given to Dora, her sister. One day the artist stumbles upon an illicit still in the woods, and, inspired by its picturesqueness, he takes out his book and starts to sketch it. Some moonshiners who have been watching him, think that he must be a revenue spy who would be better out of the way, so they lead him out to shoot him. The girls see him, and Sue rushes up to plead for his life. Kaintuck, coming along, saves the artist for Sue's sake. Later he comes to the girl, telling her that he will give her up to the man she loves. She is surprised, but when Dora comes along with the artist the situation is explained to everyone's satisfaction.

THANHOUSER.

ON THE STROKE OF FIVE (June 11).—There was nothing particularly romantic about her love story. She was a poor girl and had two suitors, both humble workingmen. The man she chose was the more worthy of the two, and loved her fondly. The other man, a brutish individual of ungovernable passions, became involved in an altercation with his foreman and savagely attacked him. Through the efforts of the successful suitor, he was captured, and, as his reputation was bad, was sent to State's Prison for a long term.

When the prisoner was set free, eight years later, his first desire was to find the woman he loved and the man he hated. With very little difficulty he located them, for they had married and settled down in the quarter where they had lived most of their lives. The ex-convict rejoiced to find that his foe had met with an accident, was helplessly paralyzed, and while he still lived, could not move nor speak, only his eyes showed that he was alive.

Calling at the tiny cottage, the convict gloated over his foe, but was careful to conceal his feelings from the wife. In the presence of her or her little girl, he was the sadly sympathetic friend. When alone with the helpless man, he gloated over him, and whispered insults into his ear. The invalid was unable to retort or complain, he could only gaze at the man, and wish that his strength might come back so that he could defend himself

The convict found that his love for the woman still existed, and he proposed that she elope with him. She rejected his advances with scorn, and his love turned to hate. He brooded over what she regarded as his wrongs, and planned a fiendish revenge.

He called at the house, pretending great friendship, and presented the little girl with a music box. She was delighted, and the mother was also pleased. Then while the two were playing with the new toy, the convict tiptoed over to the paralytic and whispered to him that the music box really contained an infernal machine, and that it had been cunningly set by clockwork to go off on the stroke of five. Then he pointed to the clock, which marked fifteen minutes of the hour, bid a pleasant farewell to the family he designed to destroy, and departed.

The woman and the child suspected nothing wrong; the man, who knew, was powerless to say anything. He suffered mortal agony as time sped, on, and he was unable to warn them. Finally his little daughter came over to "cheer up poor papa," and noticed his intense gaze. He looked from her to the blocks, which were on the table at his elbow. The two had often "played spelling." The girl would speak a word, then hold up blocks. When she picked the right letter, the man would blink his eyes, and the little girl knew how to spell many words, having learned it in this unique way.

This pastime was now put to a stern use, the man supposed to be helpless was able to convey the warning. The woman hurled the bomb from the window in time, and it rolled down the steep hill to the feet of the ex-convict, who was waiting there for the explosion that meant death of three innocent people. He had no time to escape, and the fate he had meant for others became the frightful death that providence dealt him.

THE NIGHT CLERK'S NIGHTMARE (June 14).—He was the night clerk in a country hotel, and his one dream was of the time when he could wed the head waitress (she was also the only one), and they would own a little hotel of their very own. Under these circumstances the clerk was indignant when a drummer, one of the guests, paid marked attention to the girl. She was flattered by the compliments of this man of the world, and temporarily forgot all about the poor clerk, who, like a certain patent medicine, "works while others sleep."

The drummer, having the evening to spare, decided to go to the "Opera House," and being a sociable creature, asked the waitress to accompany him. She gladly accepted the invitation, and they strolled out toward the theater, leaving the clerk to his tasks, which were few, and his thoughts of vengeance, which were many.

Night clerks in country hotels usually receive small pay, partially because they generally sleep while on duty. This particular clerk was a faithful follower of the precepts of his order, and despite his sorrowful thoughts, he dropped off to sleep before the stove.

In his dreams he followed the couple to the "Opery House," just as a terrible fire broke out. The drummer was a coward, and would have left the girl to perish, had it not been for the brave clerk, who did a heroic bit of rescue work. The girl was led off in safety, and the drummer perished in the flames, BUT——

When the clerk had taken the girl back to the hotel, the dainty drummer trailed along, as spick and span as ever, and firmly led his partner away again.

The night clerk's nightmare led him into astonishing adventures, and he disposed of his rival in many novel ways, one by throwing him into the Whirlpool Rapids at Niagara Falls, a stream which no swimmer can navigate. Still, nothing phased the drummer, he was a persistent chap, in the dream.

The poor night clerk tossed and snorted and gurgled. Finally, just as the police arrested him for a series of crimes, he woke up. The girl and the drummer returned from the theater, the drummer paid his bill, took his grips and departed to catch a midnight train, and the girl went up to her room, first stopping to blow a kiss to her fellow employee and admirer. Then the clerk realized that it had all been a dream, and that the drummer was really a fine chap, did not love the girl, but simply was killing time between trains.

He also realized that the girl loved him, and he was happy, but his terrible experience spoiled his sleep for the rest of the time that he was off duty, which showed that his experiences made a profound impression on him.

WHY TOM SIGNED THE PLEDGE (June 14).—Deacon Prim is as prim as his name, and a shining light in the cause of temperance. His son Tom, however, thinks along different lines. The deacon tries, without success, to get Tom to sign the pledge.

One evening Tom goes out with some of his fast friends, while the deacon attends a temperance meeting and is quite the star of the evening. On his way home, however, the deacon has the misfortune to fall, and breaks his eyeglasses. He also gets his clothing rather dirty.

As he blunders along the street, half blind, he meets with one disaster after another. He bunks into a lampost, blackening his eye. Robbers despoil him of his belongings, and smash his hat. A man against whom he stumbles, beats him. Finally, a friendly drunken man pours a gallon of whiskey over him So when the deacon arrives home, he looks as if he had been having a very gay night. His explanations are received with scorn, and his wife insists that he sign the pledge, which he finally does.

But good comes out of evil, for Tom is so effected by his father's supposed fall from grace, that he signs the pledge himself, being sure that he will never want to drink again, after seeing his father in such an awful state.

REPUBLIC.

WAS HE A SUFFRAGETTE? (June 11).—Mrs. Green and Mrs. Bibbs, two dyed-in-the-wool suffragettes, are all aflutter over the coming suffragette parade, and are causing no end of trouble to their respective husbands by insisting that they participate in the parade and thus show their loyalty to the cause. Both women are typical "amazons," and, while Mr. Green is a normal sized man and well able to take care of himself in spite of his wife's pugilistic tendencies, poor Bibbs is not so fortunate, as he measures a little over four feet and weighs but 110 pounds, while his wife tips the scale at 230. Like all little men, Bibbs is quite sure he can control his wife and make her do as he pleases. To prove his strength of will, he wagers $100.00 with Green that he will not parade with the suffragettes in spite of his wife's demands.

The day of the parade arrives. Green like a wise fellow, has disappeared from town on pretense of business. Bibbs decided to stay at home and show his wife that he was boss. Imagine his great surprise when Mrs. Bibbs insisted that he join the paraders and when moral suasion proved futile, the weaker sex grabbed Mr. Bibbs by the collar, and, in that humiliating position, he was compelled to not only walk through the streets, but also join the parade of suffragettes up Fifth Avenue, and what was more humiliating, when his spouse tired of the struggle, there were plenty of volunteers to help her. The next day in his office, poor Bibbs silently paid over $100.00 to Green.

A SHADOW OF THE PAST (June 15).—Bess Brinkley is left an orphan at an early age, and but for an uncle, who has gone to the great West, is left alone in the world. Betrayed by a man whom she loved, she gradually becomes a partner in crime of a famous pickpocket. Her early training finally gets her disgusted with the life she is leading, and when a home is offered to her by the long-lost uncle, who has returned a prosperous man, she gladly gives up the old life and starts anew.

She meets a handsome young foreman of the fire department and is not averse to his attentions, so different from the attentions of the men in the underworld. Eventually she marries the young fire man, who finally becomes chief of the department.

No cloud mars the happiness of the young couple until one eventful day, a former companion of Bess's underworld acquaintances appears and hovers like a shadow in the vicinity of her home, seeking an opportunity to rob it. He finally breaks in and is interrupted in his work by Bess. The mutual recognition brings on a frightful struggle, during which a disastrous fire occurs. Bess beats the man into insensibility and makes her escape from the burning building. After escaping, her conscience trougles her, when she thinks of the unconscious body lying amidst the flames, and she plunges into the firey furnace to rescue him. In the meantime, the fire alarm has been given in the fire station, and when the chief learns that the fire is at his home, he becomes frenzied, and taking the whip from the driver's hands, lashes the horses unmercifully, urging them into a maddening speed. The other drivers, seeing their chief in this state, urge their horses with whip and voice and in a little time, they arrive at the fire, hook their hose in record time, and follow their chief into the burning building. None too soon, the bodies of the chief's wife and the stranger are rescued from the fire, as the flames have eaten into the entire structure.

When the wife gains consciousness, she explains to her husband the cause of the fire, not disclosing the identity of the stranger, who, after his recovery, calls upon the chief's wife to thank her for saving his life, at the same time assuring her that in the future he will follow the straight and narrow path.

IMP. .

PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES (June 8).—This subject gives a unique record of the present presidential campaign. The three most picturesque figures in the contest are shown. These three are unquestionably Theodore Roosevelt, William H. Taft, and Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin.

In one part of the picture, Roosevelt is seen vigorously talking against Mr. Taft. In another part Mr. Roosevelt is shown by himself addressing a crowd, whilst yet in another section of the film Mr. Taft has the field to himself.

Then Senator La Follette is shown with his characteristic smile of self-confidence. Governor Wilson of Trenton, N. J., presents an austere appearance to the camera, whilst last, and possibly not least, Champ Clark, the speaker, a possible Democratic nominee, is also depicted, minus, however, the celebrated "Dawg."

NOTHING SHALL BE HIDDEN (June 10).—Fred Langdon, a young inventor, has a sweetheart, Lilian Stanhope, who returns his affection, but there is a parental objection. Fred is poor and Mr. Stanhope has ambitious schemes for marrying his daughter to a man of present wealth and position, rather than to one whose wealth and position are probably still in the making. So he parts the young people.

However, Fred is assiduous in his work and in the course of it makes one or two important scientific discoveries with regard to the transmission of sound and light waves. Calling up his still loyal sweetheart, he makes the discovery that at that moment Mr. Stanhope's house is being ransacked by burglars. So Fred calls up the police station and the burglars are captured. Fred made his discovery in virtue of the fact that he could hear what was taking place in the room although there was no direct telegraphic connection.

The burglars having been captured and Mr. Stanhope becoming aware of Fred's usefulness in the matter, offers to buy an interest in the invention, but the young lover told him nothing short of his daughter's hand would buy any part of it. Mr. Stanhope, anxious to get in on the marvelous invention, and realizing that his daughter was more than willing to trust herself to Fred Langdon, gave his consent to the union.

LET NO MAN PUT ASUNDER (June 13).—Drink is fastening it's arms around Frank Downing; he has broken promise after promise made to his wife to reform and she in despair appeals to a friend, who endeavors to persuade her to leave and accept a position as teacher in the village school in a distant part of the state. One night Downing comes home helpless, having spent his week's wages on drink, and there is no food in the house for Edna and the boy, Tommy. This decides the question and Edna and the little boy leave the degraded man to go forth into the world and earn their living.

Upon arriving in the village where her school is located, Edna meets and inquires her way of John Stevens. He is a widower and is devoted to his little daughter, Doris, to whom he is both father and mother. Through this chance meeting a friendship is established between Edna and John, which grows stronger and stronger as time passes, until John discovers that he loves her very dearly, and asks her to be his wife. Edna then admits her love and confides her story to him. He is willing to wait until she can secure a divorce.

During vacation Edna and Tommy return to their old home town, and here she secures her freedom. And now queer fate enters the picture. While she is away a man, a wreck and practically a tramp, is arrested in the village and tries to dispose of some carpenter tools, which are recognized as being the property of John Stevens. The man is Downing. He is taken to Stevens' shop in order that the tools may be identified Downing makes an appeal to Stevens—the appeal of desperation, and John, who is touched, saves the man from the law's grasp by stating he is a new workman whom he has just employed. Downing is put to work and Stevens helps him to fight his curse. Finally, he is reclaimed and becomes a man in fact.

Edna returns to the village, full of hope, and Stevens still ignorant of the relations that once existed between her and the man he has saved, is awaiting her with all a true lover's impatience. Edna enters the shop, and comes face to face with Frank. And thus does John learn the truth. The situation appals all—all but John, a man who knew his God, and knowing Him, abided His will. He joins their hands, saying, "Whom God Hath Joined Together, Let No Man Put Asunder." Downing with the past before him, refuses the sacrifice, and endeavors to leave, but John stops him. "It is God's will," he says, and the reunited husband and wife pass out of his life together.

HOW SHORTY WON OUT (June 15).—Shorty, like all freshmen, is compelled to perform many little services for the sophomores, juniors and the seniors of his college, and while serving one of his classmates, he meets charming Betty Rossmore, and immediately falls in love with her.

His bliss is not of long duration, however, as his upper classmates force him to introduce them, and then he is left out in the cold A junior promenade ball is to be given from which poor Shorty, being only a freshman, is barred. Six students invite Betty to this affair, while Shorty invites her to a dinner.

Betty, hoping to have some fun, accepts each and every invitation The six, one after another, drive up in their automobiles and enter the house. Such looks are exchanged as each comes into the room. Finally Betty appears, shaking with suppressed laughter Then Shorty walks on the scene, and triumphantly leads Betty from the room and house, enters his auto and speeds away.

The disappointed boys however, have a mix-up on the pavement, to decide who shall escort Betty, not realizing she has vanished with Shorty. A policeman is called, and the six are bundled into a patrol wagon and hurried off to jail. There they meditate on the perversity of woman, whole Betty and Shorty are enjoying their dinner.

BULL FIGHT IN NUEVO LAREDO, MEXICO (June 15).—On the occasion of Washington's Birthday, which was celebrated at Laredo, Texas, in February, there was included amongst the festivities at Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, just across the border, a bull fight, which was very largely attended by those who took part in the celebration. The various scenes attendant upon this form of sport as shown in the picture, have no trace of cruelty or brutality. Two or three sturdy bulls are turned into the ring and beset by the nimble picadors, matadors and others whose duty it is to irritate the animal and escape risk of assault by his horns.

LUX.

AFTER MANY YEARS (June 7).—The plaudits hushed, the arena empty, withi ntheir caravans the sprightly talent of the ring removes its make-up and become mortal once again. In his van, Richard, the clown, is wiping the powder from his face, whilst he jects merrily with his little son. In the friendly shade of the circus tent his wife keeps rendezvous with the man who has alienated her affection, and for whom "One master passion in the breast, Like Aaron's serpent, swallows up the rest."

Louisa, the clown's wife, was as happy as any woman until Carlo, the dashing lion trainer, came upon the scene and caused her to forsake her loving husband and her darling child. Poor Richard is so upset by his wife's flight that he is no longer able to follow his old profession. His little son takes his place in the ring, however, and meets with great success. Years roll on, and the little clown becomes director of the circus. In his employ is a certain Carlo, famed for his skill in the lions' den. He has succeeded in casting off the woman he so basely deceived and congratulates himself upon the fact that she will not think to find him back again in the same comapny in which they first met.

Returning to her old haunts, Louisa finds the man she has sought so long, and with tears and entreaties implores him to take her to his heart again He pushes her roughly aside and is about to strike her when Richard, the old clown, comes to her aid. Thus Louisa is taught the treachery of the faithless lover and is brought face to face with her much wronged husband. Overwhelmed with the sense of her ingratitude, she falls at his feet and begs forgiveness. Richard is adamant, but his son appears upon the scene and finally persuades his father to forgive and forget. He yields at last, but is almost too late, for his poor wife, worn out with her terrible experiences, sinks into a deep sleep from which there is no waking.

GAUMONT.

NANINE, THE ARTIST'S WIFE (June 9).—Nanine and Yolande are two quaint, charming peasant girls of Middle France. Often have they heard of the large city of Paris, but never have they seen or tasted of its pleasures. They are entirely contented with their lot, however, and never expect to get much further than their parental dwelling, until one afternoon, when the two girls, in company of two young peasant admirers, while frolicking over the fields, intrude upon the privacy of Maurice Crosby, the noted French artist. Crosby becomes fascinated with Nanine.

He pays Nanine a visit, only to be reprimanded by her father. Excusing himself for the intrusion, the artist takes his departure, only after leaving his address with the young peasantess, and assuring her that he would want to be the first one to give her assistance any time she might be in need of same. An opportunity for calling upon Maurice was soon granted through an accident which befell the girl's father. Nanine writes him of her plight. The artist sends back hasty word for her to come on to him where she can find honest work.

Nanine and Yolande leave for Paris in all their peasant finery, and arrive at their benefactor's studio. Crosby, however, is able to make good use of them, and is even inspired by their presence. The preference that he seems to pay to Nanine soon arouses the jealousy of Yolande, who quarrels with her sister and makes her feel so uncomfortable that she decides to return home. As she leaves the door to start her homeward journey, Maurice intercepts her, and refusing to listen to her reason for going home, pledges her his love, with the result that they are married. Thus is the dainty little Nanine properly rewarded.

THE TALE OF AN EGG (June 13).—Young Mary is indeed a pretty, winsome little damsel, but somehow or other she has never fallen in with the right fellow. This is probably due to the life of isolation that she leads, away off in her country home town. During her vacation she evolves an original scheme to make known her wishes by writing the following on a newly laid egg: "I am young, pretty and rich. I want to marry a nice young man." To this she signs her name and address and awaits further developments. After many, many incidents, the egg is finally served, hard boiled, to three young gallants in a town restaurant. The one who reads the mission on the egg, notifies the rest and the three start off in hot pursuit. The address takes them to a time-known mansion, under the grape arbor of which they discover an old maid, of whom they inquire for "Mary." She very exultantly informs them that that is her name, whereupon two of the three make their escape, the last being held in her clutches. He produces the egg, believing that it must be a mistake, but she informs him that she is the authoress of the letter on the egg, which was written thirty years ago, when both she and the egg were fresh. The dismay of the young gallant is, however, turned to exultaiton when old Mary introduces a most charming young niece, who accepts the obligation of marrying the handsome young man whom her aunt has corraled.

JIMMIE AS A HYPNOTIST (June 13).—Jimmie is deeply interested in the science of hypnotism. He studies, drinks and sleeps it. One evening, during his parents' absence, while he is engaged with his sister in the wonderful influence of hypnotism, the servant, Orphelia, helps herself to his mother's toilet dainties. Jimmie, without confiding to anyone else, notices the theft but keeps it concealed until his parents return. They, not suspecting the maid, place the blame on Jimmie's shoulders, who assures them that he is not at fault and can produce the culprit through his understanding of hypnotism. Without further ado he puts his sister (whom he has taken into the secret), in a hypnotic spell, and, of course she singles out the culprit.

NESTOR.

THE HALF-BREED'S WAY (June 3).—David Miller, a Western farmer, is betrothed to Marie Mantell, an Eastern girl. He is addicted to drink and his constant imbibing of whiskey brutalizes his nature. He goes East and marries Marie, bringing her to a desolate Western farm. He continues drinking and his young wife suffers much cruelty at his hands. A half-breed cowboy, who is employed at the ranch, becomes devoted to her to the extent of protecting her at crucial moments when the farmer, in a drunken state, threatens to strike her. Phillip Hall, an Easterner, comes West for his health and is given work by Miller. He is hurt in a round-up and nursed by Marie. He is a ray of light in her desolate life, and the Easterner's heart is full of pity for the young wife. David goes on a drunken rampage and destroys Marie's little garden, which she has nurtured tenderly. When she remonstrates with him, he menaces her life. The half-breed again puts himself between them and David knocks him to the ground. The half-breed picks himself up and the sight of the weeping woman makes him swear Indian vengeance. Getting a rifle, he follows the farmer, who had mounted his horse, and rode away, and shoots him. Miller falls near Philip, who has been reading in the woods, and when his calls bring the sheriff and his men, he is accused of the crime. The half-breed has returned to the house, and when the sheriff stops at Miller's ranch with his prisoner, the half-breed maintains an Indian stolidity until Marie and Philip, in the stress of the situation, divulge their love for each other. He confesses it was he that killed the farmer and makes a dash for liberty, with the posse in chase. They gain on him when a shot rings out. The half-breed prefers death at his own hands rather than give himself into the hands of the law.

THE MOUNTAIN DAISY (June).—Jack Spencer, a tenderfoot photographer, arrives on the stage-coach, and the next day meets Daisy Layson while he is out taking pictures. The young people are mutually attracted, but Mr. Layson has already selected Bert Howard as his prospective son-in-law, and will not give his consent to his daughter's marriage with Jack.

The young people plan to elope. Their plans, however, are overheard by Bert, who hastens to Mr. Layson and acquaints him of the fact. Jack has become a favorite with the boys and the stage-driver in particular, so when the young people tell him that they expect the old man to give chase, the driver at once promises to help them. Accordingly, he writes a note to the sheriff as follows: "Sheriff Carter:—I expect to be held up between here and Elveda by two men well known to you. Send posse quick, as I have a very valuable package aboard. Jim Ruskin." He sends the note post haste and the sheriff and his men at once respond, overtaking Mr. Layson and Bert just as they reach the stage-coach. Greatly to the amusement of the passengers, who are in on the joke, the sheriff and his men hustle father and rejected suitor off to prison until Daisy and Jack are safley made one.

THE RANCH GIRL'S CHOICE (June 7).—While Bess, the ranch owner's daughter, is on her way to town, her horse goes lame. Bud, awandering cowboy, happens along at this moment and takes a stone out of the horse's hoof. The girl hands him a flower, which Tom, the foreman of her father's ranch, had given her. They part: the girl to go to town; the boy to go on his way looking for work. He stops at a sign reading: "Cowboys wanted at the Circle K Ranch." On arriving at the ranch, the foreman takes a dislike to him, recognizing the flower the cowboy is wearing as the one he had given Bess. The owner of the ranch, however, likes the boy's looks and engages him, much to the dissatisfaction of the foreman.

Bess returns home and is delighted to find the young puncher employed on her father's ranch. The foreman, observing the growing friendship between Bud and the girl, makes Bud's lot a hard one, calling him down whenever an opportunity presents itself and finally discharges him. Bess's father, when he hears of this action, re-engages the boy and discharges the foreman instead. Three other cowboys on the ranch, friends of the foreman, threaten to leave unless the ranch owner takes the foreman back, but the ranchman is obdurate and the four men ride off, threatening vengeance.

A week later, as the boy is returning from the bank with money for the payroll, he is seen by one of the ex-foreman's friends and the news is carried to the foreman at the Lone Tree Saloon. They arrange to hold up the boy and give the ranch owner the impression that the boy has stolen it.

Taking a short cut, they head Bud off and he is taken to an old hut, where he is bound and thrown into a corner while the men play cards and drink.

In the meanwhile, the ranch owner is becoming anxious at the prolonged absence of Bud and sends the new foreman to the bank to see what is causing the delay. The foreman comes back to the ranch with the news that the boy left the bank hours ago. The owner orders all his men out to find Bud, accompanied by Bess. Coming to the cross roads, the girl decides to go the other way alone and comes to the hut. Looking through the window, she sees the men and hastens to the cowboys. They follow her to the hut and Bud is released, while the men are taken to the sheriff's office. On returning home, the father of Bess gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter to Bud.

SOLAX.

MICKY'S PAL (June 12).—After serving out their three-year sentence, Micky and his pal, Tom, are released from prison. Micky goes back to his former manner of living and tries to induce Tom to do likewise. Tom, however, is tired of an underworld existence and determines to be "straight." Hence he breaks with Micky and they both pursue different paths.

Tom finds employment with good folks, and gets along nicely, until one day, while out walking with his sweetheart (the maid servant in the house where he is employed), he meets Micky. Anxious to forget his past and to avoid making explanations to his sweetheart, Tom snubs his former pal.

Micky decides to fix him. He goes back to his hovel and writes an anonymous letter, informing Tom's employers that Tom is an ex-convict. Tom after his outing comes home feeling sorry that he had snubbed Micky. He writes him a letter apologizing and encloses some money. Tom's employers disregard the letter which Micky has written. However, their suspicions are aroused, and so they decide to test Tom's honesty. Before going to the opera, they place on a dresser within the sight of Tom an imitation pearl necklace worth 15 cents.

Micky, who is "laying for" Tom, goes to the house that very night and steals the imitation pearl necklace. This happens about the time Tom's employers return from the opera. Tom is near their auto smoking a pipe. He is watching the car while the chauffeur is having a drink. Thus employed, Tom sights an object skulking in the backyard. He hides as the object approaches the car. Then when he recognizes Micky, he makes a spring for him and demands an explanation. Micky shows fight. During the struggle, Tom's pipe lands in the car and sets it on fire.

Tom's employers confront him and although he explains they are not satisfied. His record is against him. They have him discharged.

Micky returns home and finds Tom's letter of apology and the money enclosed. He is full of remorse and returns and straightens things out for Tom.

THE GREAT DISCOVERY (June 14).—An old scientist is at work perfecting a "child incubator." He engages a young chemist as his assistant. The young chemist is attracted by the scientist's daughter. While the old man is busy with his scientific conferences and research work, the young pair go off and get married. A year later finds the scientist still at his labors, while his daughter, in the meanwhile, gives birth to a baby. The absent-minded and eccentric scientist is kept in ignorance of the circumstances. His son-in-law one day gets an idea. He places his baby in the old man's incubator and when the scientist discovers the crowning glory of his work he takes the kid and runs off to spread the glad news to his associates of the scientific research societies, a superannuated collection of old fogies.

When the wife discovers that her baby is gone she grows frantic and naturally her young husband run off to the scientific conference to rescue his offspring. He is of a diabolical turn and decides to scare the scientists by substituting a monkey for the baby. He succeeds splendidly.

AMERICAN.

THE BRAND (May 30).—Jim Haroll was a blacksmith. He lived alone with his old father until the matrimonial bee lodged securely in his curly head. Then Jim found a copy of "Cupid's Darts," fell madly in love with an advertised beauty and sent for her to share his hearth and fortune. One year tired the beauty. A perfumery salesman called one day and Jim, glancing through the window, beheld her in his arms. In blind rage he rushed to his forge, seized a red-hot iron and pushing his wife's betrayer to the floor branded him upon the cheek.

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (June 3).—Jess loved Norman Brown, but Jess was jealous, and when Norman replied to some pleasantries from a village belle, Jess was seized by the Green-Eyed Monster. It caused a terrible lot of trouble in La Mesa and when Jess "picked up" with a tramp in the woods the town was agog with excitement.

CUPID THROUGH PADLOCKS (June 6).—Old Bob Langfall guarded two pretty daughters carefully. When Jim and Charley Bradley met them by accident, old Bob showed them the butt of his gun and bade them adieu. But Jim and Charley had a widowed mother, and old Bob was a widower. And now you begin to see how it all came about. "In Union There Is Strength."

FOR THE GOOD OF HER MEN (June 10).—Zeke Farrell, with his loving wife, two sons and two daughters, had long run an illicit distillery. The boys liked their own brew and often quarreled. The mother sobbed herself to sleep many a night at the thought of the coming drunkards and the old father in an unlawful business. Then Will Beverly came. Love sprang up between him and the pretty daughter, Mabel. The mother knew they could never marry. So she made the greatest—the supreme sacrifice she told the Federal marshal of the still. Will Beverly, through an odd twist in the story, was accused. How he extricated himself and won Mabel is reserved for one of the best Western subjects you have ever seen to tell.

CHAMPION.

CAMILLE (June 10).—The locale of the story is in France and the characters of the nobility as well as those of the half world who live by their wits. Camille is a woman who belongs to the latter class and her associates are of the Bohemian sort, actors, painters and literary folk, and her male friends are an old Duke, who showers money on her, and a Count who is her escort to places of amusement.

Camille is beautiful, accomplished, and at the period of the opening of the story, is satiated with pleasure and her better nature asserts itself. She longs for something genuine, a love that is good and pure. Armand du Val is the son of a nobleman and theirs is an old and honored family. He sees Camille and falls in love with her, worshipping her at a distance. He calls at her house in company of a friend and the visit is most opportune. Camille has returned from the opera with the Count and he bores her with his coarse and unwelcome attentions. Armand is introduced and his frank, manly avowal of love comes like a revelation and is sweet music to her ears. For the first time in her eventful life she loves and is deliriously happy.

There is a season of bliss for the young couple. Camille removes to the country and Armand is in constant attention until their dream is shattered. A sister of Armand is betrothed to a young nobleman and the father of the groom learns of Armand's infatuation for Camille, and breags the news to his father. Camille is induced to break with Armand so that the young couple may marry and be happy and no scandal shall mar their bliss.

Armand does not understand and Camille will not explain. Armand denounces her for a flirt. He creates a scene in a gambling house, hurling Camille from him brutally and throwing his winnings in her face. There is a duel with the Count, her former love, and Armand is exiled in disgrace. The dread disease, consumption, lays hold of Camille and she is in the throes of death with her beauty gone. Armand is summoned by his father and goes to Camille, but, alas! too late! She sees him, imprints one long loving kiss on his lips and expires in his arms.

A WESTERN CHILD'S HEROISM (June 12).—Bill Burton, a miner, with his wife and child, the latter a girl of 12 years, lives in a little log cabin in a clearing of the Blockwood Hills. One day, two rustlers, Mexicans, are being chased by a posse and one of them is shot from his horse, and is thought to be killed, but as the party sweeps by, he crawls into the bushes and makes his way to the cabin of the miner, Burton. The miner is just leaving when the Mexican arrives and craves shelter. At first, Burton refuses this, but heeding the pleadings of his wife and child, he consents to take him in, and when the searching party passes by that way he pretends to know nothing of the Mexican's whereabouts.

Later Burton makes a lucky strike at the diggings. He returns to his cabin elated over his find. While explaining this to his wife the Mexican overhears, but pretending to sleep he averts suspicion, and sees the secreting of the gold in the chimney place. Then pretending a sudden illness, the Mexican preys on the sympathy of the miner and the latter sets off to secure a doctor. Immediately, finding the coast clear, he makes ready to rob his benefactor. The miner's wife struggles with the Mexican. Dorothy, the daughter, now takes a hand and, securing the villain's gun, she forces him to desist from his fell purpose. He goes off, with maledictions on his lips.

He soon makes good his threats, for he enlists the services of a number of marauding Indians and they sneak upon the cabin. Luckily the child discovers their approach. A fight then begins and the miner and his faithful wife fire with deadly effest on their enemies. The Indians no wprepare to set the cabin on fire. In the meantime the child climbs up the chimney, and stealing a horse from among the bunch tethered by the Indians, she makes off for assistance. The fire now rages without the cabin and pretty soon the inmates will be consumed, but at this juncture on dash the cowboys led by the young heroine, Dorothy. The Indians are driven off, the family is saved, and in the meantime the Mexican is captured.

MAJESTIC.

ROOM 257 (June 9).—A thief, having registered at the Grand Hotel, sneaks into room 257 to make a "haul." The occupant of the room surprises him at work and is shot. The thief arranges the appearance of the victim so that the police will dismiss the case as a suicide; but he forgets the stub of a cigar and also leaves the imprint of his heel on a piece of hotel stationery lying on the floor. While walking in the lobby of the hotel, the floor of which is being mopped by the porter, the thief leaves tracks, which enable the clever detective to find him. With the aid of the cigar stub and the heel print, a clear case is shrewdly made out against the guilty man, and the manner in which he is quietly taken into custody wins the admiration of all concerned in what appeared to be a baffling case.

SHOCKING HIS FLOCK (June 9).—Parson Jonas is very anxious to fire his colored congregation with religious zeal and enthusiasm. But preach as he may, the colored brothers and sisters fall asleep regularly during the taking of the collection. The parson and Deacon Jackson put their heads together, and decide that some desperate action must be taken to save the church from going bankrupt. Electricians are called in, who wire the pews of the church, so that the parson can shock the occupants of any pew he desires. The following Sunday the congregation gathers in goodly numbers, but during the appeal for money, falls asleep as usual. Parson Jonas asks who will donate ten dollars to the cause. No one responds, but when the parson throws on a switch, the first row rise as though they were extremely anxious to give away their money. The other rows respond in turn with equal spirit and the church members start a revival that is wonderful to behold. If some bad boys had not introduced a ghost through a front window of the church, the exit of the congregation would have been quieter.

UP A TREE (June 11).—The wives of several members of a fashionable club have been invited to an affair at which no men will be allowed. The curiosity of the women is awakened, but they will not admit to each other that they care anything about the affair. Hamilton Roe sneaks off to the ball at which the women are to gather, and, with a large pair of opera glasses in possession, climbs the tree himself, but what he sees is rather good view of the interior of the building. A policeman happens along, and hearing a noise overhead, looks up into the tree and orders Roe down. To his surprise, twenty men fall out of the tree, each with a telescope, opera glasses and all sorts of "aids-to-the-eyesight." The policeman is about to arrest them, when he is told of the women's meeting. He accepts the largest telescope and climbs the tree himself, but what he sees is rather disappointing.

THE ARTFUL CURE (June 11).—The pretty wife of George Hoper is a very charming woman, an excellent housekeeper, and, in fact, all that any man could desire for a life partner. But the breakfast food craze has taken complete possession of her and she has reached a point where the mere mention of meat as a food fills her very soul with horror. Her husband eats his vegetarian diet with forced cheerfulness, but the craving for a nice big, thick steak constantly increases, and when he sees his wife give a large, juicy pork chop to the cat, he can stand it no longer, and steals the luscious morsel for his own dinner. The pork chop gives him an idea. "If one cat causes wifey to buy one pork chop, twenty cats should result in twenty pork chops." Hoper goes to a bird-store, and after playing with the monkeys and rabbits, buys a litter of kittens and several pretty little puppies as a gift for his wife. He anxiously waits for the dear little pets to be fed, so that he can steal their food, but his feelings can't be imagined when he sees his loving wife feeding them on milk and breakfast food instead of meat. Hoper becomes desperate. A friend shows him an article in the newspaper giving an account of a bad case of "Rickets" caused by eating only vegetable foods. He immediately calls his servants together, and they all pretend to be suffering from "Rickets." They paint blotches on their faces and fool the wife completely, but she will not believe that the lack of meat is the cause of their illness. Finally, one night while she is peacefully sleeping and dreaming of whole wheat biscuits, Hoper paints her pretty face, so that she awakes to discover that the "Rickets" have attacked her in vigorous fashion. This is an argument in favor of meat that appeals to her vanity, and, thoroughly scared, she orders enough meat to feed a menagerie.

HAMFAT'S SUCCESS (May 30).—Anthony Ceaser Brutus Hamfat is a struggling tragedian whose one-night stand performances bring him to success. He applies vainly to K. E. Frobert, the famous manager, and returns home to find his landlady in a fury for his delayed payment. As he hurries to his room the landlady speeds for a policeman. Hamfat, in extreme despair, pulls on an old rube costume and makes a hasty exit in disguise. Two swindlers believe this to be a splendid chance and they invite the "old farmer" to dine with them in a gay Broadway cafe. Hamfat accepts. He does not neglect exhibiting a roll of stage money which he found in the costume. The swindlers are greatly pleased with themselves. At length they propose selling a third interest in an imaginary mine and Hamfat agrees. He is the real gainer, for he takes his change in real money. Hamfat hastens homeward in a taxicab to settle his accounts, buying flowers for his landlady. The swindlers are apprehended by the police and get a richly deserved punishment. It happens that Frobert, the manager, has been dining in this same restaurant. Hamfat is recognized. Just as the Thespian is giving the long-suffering landlady her money, a messenger brings an offer from Frobert to give Hamfat a good part in comic opera. He is proven an actor, after all!

CHESTNUT GROVE MYSTERY (June 2).—The aged beggar is alone in his hut. It is nightfall. Carefully closing the door and window he takes a bottle of whiskey from the fireplace and gayly empties its contents. He goes to the wall and uncovers a hiding place, and takes out a hollow piece of wood, from which he brings forth gold, jewels and banknotes, upon which he gazes lovingly. He falls asleep, and dreams he sees himself on the road again, laying in wait for the unfortunate Tax Collector of Subourg. The carriage approaches. He calls and begs for help. The collector stops pitying the poor wounded man, and helps him into his carriage. Later, while making repairs on the carriage, the collector receives a heavy blow from the beggar's cane and dies. After robbing the dead collector, the beggar drags the body to an adjacent pond, near a chestnut grove. This murder still remains unsolved. Suddenly he awakes. Someone is knocking. He hides the precious piece of wood. The door opens, and in walk two gendarmes who seek shelter. The old man trembles. The gendarmes are surprised at his attitude. Being refused a drink they start a search and first find the empty whiskey bottle, and later come upon the hiding place of the piece of wood, which they find to their great surprise, full of gold, etc., which is wrapped in a piece of newspaper telling of the mysterious murder. Understanding that they are in the presence of the escaped murderer, they handcuff him and take him away.

THE HARDEST WAY (June 4).—Dolly Brown, a young English girl, comes to America to seek employment as a governess. She is swindled at the dock by two wily rogues, and then temporarily befriended by a good old colonel and his sister. She insists on seeking employment, however, and finds it a very difficult path. At last, she obtains a position in the offices of a millionaire broker who is attracted by her resplendent beauty. This man woos her persistently, sends flowers, gifts of all sorts, which the proud girl refuses to accept. A young reporter who had assisted her on her arrival, recognizes her in the broker's office. While he is waiting outside to see her again, her employer calls her into his private office, and tries to kiss her. The girl faints, and the alarmed and cowardly millionaire snatches his hat, to disappear through a private entrance. As the girl regains consciousness, she hears the telephone ringing. She answers and learns that the fine old colonel is being swindled by some stock operators, who are sending word to Barney, her employer, to buy all the colonel's mining stock possible, in order to freeze him out. Dolly takes down the message, and then determines to save her benefactor from the machinations of the swindlers. She risks her undesirable position, takes her hat and coat and hastens out. There she is met by the persistent reporter, to whom she confides her story. He realizes its importance, and he telephones an order to his own broker to act on the information which he now holds. The two young people then hurry downtown and arrive at the colonel's office just in time to interfere with the sale of his stock to the very same swindlers who had defrauded the young girl on the dock. Dolly and the reporter both make fortunes for themselves by their quick-witted actions, and the colonel's property jumps up tremendously in value. The colonel and his sister adopt her. Dolly finds her haven at last, and the young reporter wins as his wife a very splendid woman who has been tried and found pure gold.

SUFFRAGE AND THE MAN (June 6).—A young man learns that his betrothed is leaning toward the suffragette cause. He remonstrates with her father to be told "my butler and my bootblack may vote—why not my wife and daughter?" He cannot agree, however, and their quarrel brings about a broken engagement. Disappointed and unhappy, he seeks forgetfulness by going to a summer resort. There he succumbs to the wiles of a designing mother, and caught in an embarrassing position her daughter "feinting a faint" in his arms—he permits their engagement to be announced. He learns, by an accidental eavesdropping, of the mother's trickery. He loses no time to denounce the deception and withdraw his offer of marriage. The mother and daughter promptly start suit for breach of promise. In the meantime votes have been won for women. The trial of the suit comes up before a mixed jury, of men and women, with the old sweetheart as forewoman of the twelve peers. Their verdict is acquittal! And as might be expected, "suffrage wins Herbert" with a permanently happy result—in his reconciliation and marriage.

TIT FOR TAT (June 9).—Two grenadiers are sent to the house of a rich peasant. They are admitted by the little girl of the house and are courteously received by the servant. She is quite pleased with them and has set the table for them. But the master does not like this. They should be served in the barn, with soup and water. To her great dislike, the servant obeys the order.

Through the window of the barn, they see the master feasting with a friend. They go into the yard, saw the boards in a little bridge which spans a stream, and then let the geese loose. They call the peasant. He runs after the geese, attempts to cross the bridge, when the boards give way and he falls into the water. Quickly the grenadiers go to the rescue. Grateful for their noble act, the peasant invites them to join him at his meal. Later, the peasant returns to the bridge to repair it. But what is this? A board is sawed! Ah, the deceitful rascals. The peasant understands all now. Now is his chance to laugh! Craftily he puts the boards back without fastening them and in a friendly manner calls the grenadiers. Not suspecting, they start to cross the bridge. They fall into the water and are struggling, to the great amusement of the peasant, who lets them struggle so as to enjoy his revenge the better.

POWERS

THOSE WERE HAPPY DAYS (June 12).—It is springtime, and the flowers are in bloom and the woods and fields look inviting. Willie and Margery find the school-room hot and stuffy, and they do not wish to pursue their studies. Their parents intervene and they start to school with clean faces, but in rebellious spirits. On the way they stumble over a can of black paint. Margery has an inspiration and they act on it. They will feign illness in order to avoid going to school. The little girl proposes that they decorate their faces to indicate they are afflicted with measles. To think is to act, and they are soon tattooed in a manner to strike consternation to anyone beholding them. They wander into the school-room, take their seats, and soon attract the attention of the fussy old pedogogue. He examines their faces by the aid of a magnifying glass and is frightened. He hastily dismisses school, admonishing the other children to flee for their lives. He rushes to the huddle and seeks the services of a doctor. The parents of the children are notified, and a general hunt for Willie and Margery is instituted. The children wander away to a cool and sequestered spot and are enjoying themselves, eating a sumptuous lunch, when the party descends upon them, timid and apprehensive of being afflicted with the contagious disease. The parents are grief-stricken, but boldly approach and take the schemers in their arms. The paint rubs off by contact with their clothing and the ruse is discovered. Willie and Margery are soundly spanked and the procession of villagers wind their way homewards, filled with resentment.

VIEWS OF THE HUDSON VALLEY (June 12).—This subject shows pictures of quaint and picturesque scenes and historical points of interest. This section is rich in scenic splendor, and students will recognize many points of interest of which they have read and which have furnished important material for the chroniclers of history.

ITALIAN FRIENDSHIP (June 15).—Tony is an Italian laborer whose household is presided over by his sister, Rosa. At breakfast Tony complains of feeling ill, but resolutely goes to his work. Guido is looking for employment, and applies to the foreman over the gang with which Tony is working. He is given work and joins Tony in the task of removing heavy stones from a quarry. Rosa brings Tony's dinner and is introduced to Guido and they are mutually impressed. Tony gradually becomes fainter and stops to rest. John, the brutal foreman, appears on the scene and discharges him without pay. Tony returns home and tells his sister of his treatment and she is incensed. They debate the question and Tony leaves with only one desire—to obtain the money that is rightfully due him. He enters the office of the foreman and pays himself out of the cash drawer. Just as he is leaving the foreman steps in and, in the dim light, a fight ensues, in which Tony is wounded by a knife thrust into the arm. He goes home and his hurt is bandaged by Rosa. Guido enters just as a policeman accompanies the foreman to the cabin of Tony. Tony is accused of the theft and the foreman points to the wound on his arm. Guido takes in the situation and, noticing a knife on the table, he inflicts a wound on himself, corresponding to the one on the arm of Tony. He then announces that he stole the money and engaged in the fight. The officer is in a quandary, but finally settles the affair to the satisfaction of everyone concerned. Tony and Guido have a feast during which the foreman broods over the occurrence and resolves to have revenge. He repairs to the hovel and, looking through the window, sees the gay party and he is compelled to swallow his wrath.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THOSE EYES (June 8).—An actress is the possessor of a life size portrait of her mother. She is in love with a young fellow who escorts her to the theater. During her absence, a burglar breaks into her rooms and commences searching for articles of value. The eyes of the portrait annoy him, so he cuts them out. He hears the actress returning, and, hiding behind the painting, applies his eyes to the holes he made. The lover departs, and the actress is left alone. Looking at the painting she is horrified to see the eyes watching her, and after a long period of agony she manages to telephone to her lover for aid. He arrives with a policeman just in time to save his sweetheart from the housebreaker.

THE NEW TEACHER (June 8).—A young man receives an appointment as a teacher, and finds he has to take charge of two mischievous boys. The pranks they play upon him constitute the laughter-provoking incidents of the story. The school-room is soon a perfect wreck, and the teacher receives a summary dismissal for being unable to maintain discipline.

REX.

THE DIAMOND PATH (June 4).—There's something brave and bold and individual about the name Dorothy. Dorothy happened to be a reporter, and a reporter always happens to be where things are happening. Her landlady happened to have a daughter, who happened to be the maid of an heiress. There were two impecunious scions of society. They couldn't make any money, so the next thing to do was get some anyhow. They didn't waste scruples on the exact method of obtaining the necessary. The Diamond Path looked not so worse to them.

They conceived the kind idea of convincing their social friends that paste was just about the same as diamonds, settling the argument by substituting the bogus for the genuine stones. However, one of their victimized friends was not entirely convinced—and the maid was accused. Remember the maid? Her mother, with fears and tears, told Dorothy all about it and then a few sentences. Dorothy determined to detect the real thieves and exonerate the girl. Diamonds, grit, cowardice, cruelty, criminality, bravery, the heart of a determined girl, vindictiveness, vindication, just deserts and gratitude play the leading part in the rest of the story. Dorothy and honesty triumph, and the end of the gentlemen thieves and the story are simultaneous.

THE PRICE OF PEACE (June 6).—She was dying. Already beyond was near. Her spirit was approaching the afterwards. With a brave effort, she turned her face to her husband and sweetheart, to whom she was more than all. Feebly her trembling lips whispered, "It is cold." The icy finger of the skeleton with the scythe had already touched the body that was his forfeit. Into the man's eyes came a hard glint, the light of battle. His grief declared war against the invincible antagonist whose very defeat is but transient, whose victories are eternal. Again she turned to him. "It is dark," she murmured. Tenderly he kissed the faded lips and lighted the candle.

She was dead. With her had withered all the accumulated hopes and tender plans of youth and love. With her had died all of himself but his body. His being was minus. He tried to forget, but memory was stubborn and cruel. Always he would see her in his tortured mind, with the tender smile of old on her lips and the soft glow in her eyes—and in desperate abandon, he would curse death.

Then he met the devil. Bright lights, wanton women, careless kisses, vice embraced in the arms of sin, a carnival of corruption, a feast of folly—he came within a few hours of hell. But stronger than the evil and the devil in him was the memory, casting its halo over the hollow haunts of hell—and the memory triumphed.

One day, his soul pitying the pathetic burden of his heart, it whispered a message of its immortality, the promise of reunion in the eternal sequel, and, eager and impatient, he went to meet her. He went to the country, and in the lonesome woods his lonely longing sought release. Revolver in hand, he was ready to send that which would remain and live after what had been, he was dead across the oceans of space to the shores of eternity, where she was waiting. Twilight was mantling the earth with its soft veil. A few monks from the near by monastery were walking through the woods, communing with their Master. They met him. His story was told and heard—and they offered him the peace that bides and abides. He entered the House of God, peace entered his heart, and a song sang in his soul.

TEARS O' PEGGY (June 9).—A pretty woman's tears are the greatest persuasive argument on the planet earth. A woman's tears will melt the coldest heart, and will make the heart manifest itself when there isn't any at all.

They were in love, and pa frowned on the romance. When a pa frowns on a romance between a pretty, determined girl and the man "she was born to marry" there's always an interesting story. The girl knew the power of tears—because she was a girl! And she determined to cry her father into submission. Such weeping and wailing was never heard since Gomorrah went into the cemetery business. And the accompanying "gnashing of teeth" was contributed by pa. The next few days were devoted chiefly to tears. Theirs was a happy home. His stubborn will was almost drowned, when it became so used to the flood that it learned to swim. And hour after hour, day after day, the crying specialty continued. The tears and the girl had their way, and the mock sadness turned into a very genuine joy and jubilant justice.

THE OUTCAST (June 8).—The prologue shows the life of a trapper, living in the solitude of the forest. He digs a bear trap, which is covered with boughs and grass. An Indian girl, armed with a bow and arrow, creeps close to a wild turkey, which she brings down. As she runs forward to gather up her prey she falls into the trap. Evans, the trapper, finds her there and on lifting her from the pit, finds that she has sprained her ankle, and takes her to his cabin, and makes her as comfortable as possible. As the shades of evening fall and the pain subsides, the girl drops into a slumber, and loth to awaken her, Evans leaves her in possession of his cabin and, wrapped in a blanket, sleeps outside.

In the morning, the girl having recovered sufficiently, he lifts her to his horse, and mounting behind her, proceeds to the Indian camp. On the way he is attacked by a trio of Indians, who fire at him from behind a tree, and the trapper brings down one of his assailants. The others rush back to the camp, and when Evans arrives he is roughly dealt with by the Indians, but is saved by the intervention of the girl, who is the daughter of the Sioux chief.

Some time later a party of Cheyennes visit the Sioux, and the chief buys the girl from her father. Though she has not seen the white trapper since the day of her accident, the Indian girl's heart has gone out to him, and the prospect of becoming the squaw of the Cheyenne chief is distasteful to her. It is an unwilling bride, indeed, whom the old Cheyenne brings to his tepee, and when he attempts to subject her, she turns upon him with a knife, and leaving his lifeless form dying in the tent, makes her escape. When she reaches her own village, however, she fears the wrath of her father, and suddenly the thought occurs to her to seek refuge again in the trapper's cabin.

Evans, who has fallen in love with the girl, assures her of his protection. The Cheyennes, wild with anger at the death of their chief, call upon the Sioux to deliver the girl to them, and are assured that she is not in camp. They trail her to the cabin, and, while Evans is away examining his traps, break down the barricaded door and set the house on fire. As Evans is returning he sees the Indians gallop off with their prisoner, and flying to the Sioux camp tells of what has occurred. The Sioux chief immediately calls out his braves, who start in pursuit of the Cheyennes.

The girl is about to meet her death when the Sioux arrive, and a hand to hand conflict ensues, in the heat of which Evans rescues the girl and gallops away with her. As the sun is setting, standing on the crest of a hill, he points out to her a wagon train of emigrants, and hand in hand they go to his people—and safety.

Protect Your Audiences and Property

Almost daily the newspapers record instances similar to the above. Think what it would mean to you if such a fire should occur in your theater—think of the loss of property and perhaps human lives! And think of the business you would lose while repairs were being made, and of the many people who would be so badly frightened that you would lose their patronage permanently.

J-M ASBESTOS WOOD BOOTHS

will prevent such losses and safeguard your audiences. These booths are absolutely fireproof and are endorsed by the National Board of Fire Underwriters.

J-M Booths are made in portable, semi-portable and permanent styles; also in special sizes and styles to order. Write nearest Branch for Booklet.

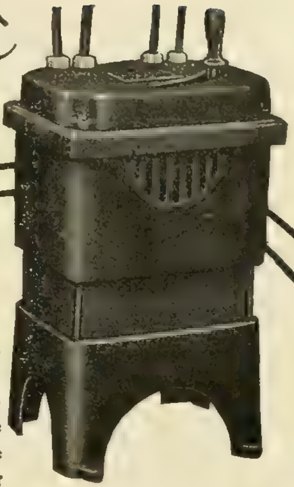
COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc

saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

Kansas City Fire Warden and an Arkansas Exhibitor both like the

RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN

OFFICE OF THE FIRE WARDEN,
Kansas City, Mo., April 9, 1912.

American Theater Curtain & Supply Co., St. Louis, Mo.

Gentlemen:—I have inspected your curtain now installed at the Wonderland Theater, and would say that I consider it a very good device.

From a fire standpoint and moral condition, I consider it one of the best I have ever come in contact with. Very truly yours,

ROBERT E. HENDERSON,
Ass't Fire Warden.

Fort Smith, Ark., March 25, 1912.

American Theater Curtain & Supply Co., St. Louis, Mo.

Gentlemen:—The curtain came in all right, and it is producing the most beautiful pictures I ever looked at, and I'll tell the world that. If anybody wants to know anything about the curtain down in this country, you can refer them to me. Yours very truly,

HOYT KIRKPATRICK.

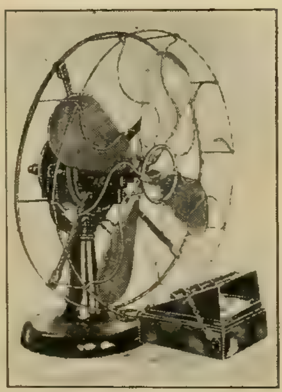
TROPICAL BREEZE



OUR LEADER

"Here It Is"—Mr. M. P. Manager

You've been looking for it for a long time

The Tropical Breeze fan appliance does the work of purifying and perfuming the air in your theater.

This is the only fan device on the market to-day that thoroughly deodorizes, purifies and perfumes the air without obstructing any of the air from your fan. It will give your patrons and employees a wholesome and healthy air to breathe. It will perfume your theater with a most agreeable odor, not in the least offensive to the most refined taste. It will please your patrons and they will come again.

It can be used on revolving, swinging or stationary fans or fans inclined at any angle. Remember that the hot summer days will make the air in your theater very offensive without this device. No theater complete without this device.

Price of Tropical Breeze Fan Appliance, handsomely Copper Oxidized, complete with fluid, $4.00. Hot days are here. Write to-day for full information.

MR. EXHIBITOR--ON YOUR GUARD!

The ranks of the Sales Company are now divided. On one side a clean slate is offered backed by men who do not fear competition, but who believe in natural progress through sound business methods. Ten manufacturers offer you ten established brands of known worth and popularity, or a complete program of twenty-one reels through the Film Supply Co. of America.

The manufacturers selling through the Film Supply Company do not force their customers to accept their full program; they have not merged their plants and studios into one company.

They do not ask the exhibitor to take his service from exchanges they (the manufacturers) own or control. They possess no exchanges that are to be given exclusive territory. You will not have one office to deal with, where you must pay the price and take what you get or go without. You can select your own program from the releases of The Film Supply Company of America, whose exchanges buy what they want on a just basis of quality.

We offer known films including all the big features by the real feature makers. We create no new "brands," remember that.

Our new executive offices and shipping departments occupy the entire third floor of the handsome new building at 133-135 West 44th Street, in the heart of New York City, and easily the finest appointed quarters in the trade.

TO SCENARIO WRITERS

The Powers Motion Picture Company wishes to purchase the

Highest Class of Photoplays

Obtainable—stories of American Life Dramas and Comedies. To this end we will inaugurate a prize contest and offer the following inducement to stimulate writers to better effort:

First prize $100.00 Third...... 50.00
Second .... 75.00 Fourth..... 25.00

CONDITIONS OF CONTEST:

All manuscripts must be typewritten and accompanied by return postage or self addressed envelope.

All scripts must be addressed to the scenario department and labeled, "Contest." Otherwise they will be treated as regular contributions.

The stories will be read and passed upon by a committee composed of moving picture experts. All contributions considered available will be purchased. The names of successful authors will be placed on the films.

In the future we will pay the highest prices for scenarios commensurate with their worth.

The contest is now open and will close July 15, 1912, and all manuscripts in competition will be held until July 20, 1912.

Address all communications regarding this contest to the scenario department.

"CHALLENGED TO STAY AT MIDNIGHT AT THE HAUNTED HOUSE"

Ghosts at Circle X Camp

A Western comedy full of laughter from start to finish, showing how a tenderfoot is initiated in the West. The bully being the toughest man on the ranch is elected to put the new comer through the mill. Later on the tenderfoot cleverly turns the tables, and almost scares his tormentor to death by approaching him dressed as a ghost.

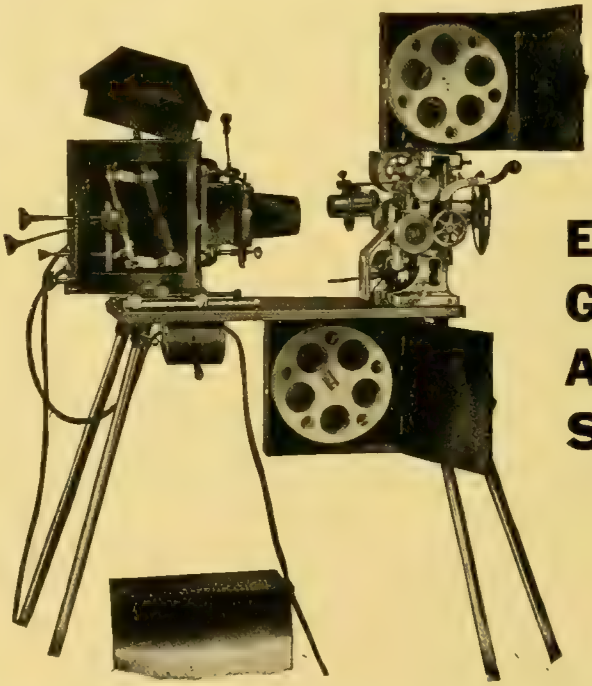
THE MACHINE THAT DOESN'T COME BACK

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6 sells itself on its reputation and holds its job on its merit.

Any machine may break down and it can wear out; but with proper care, our No. 6 will last a lifetime and its parts are all interchangeable and are made by us of the very best material obtainable.

5600 in Actual Service



Everyone Giving Absolute Satisfaction

Money and knowledge cannot build a more durable machine than Power's No. 6 and it projects flickerless, clear pictures; those are two good reasons why it never comes back.

Don't overlook the value of Power's Adjustable Inductor for use on alternating current in place of the rheostat. It will save enough current to pay for itself within four months and lasts a lifetime.

"101" BISON HEADLINERS

ONE, TWO AND THREE REEL FRONTIER SUBJECTS
SENSATIONAL, MILITARY AND PIONEER STORIES

A Soldier's Honor

In Two Reels

Released Saturday, June 15th

All the stirring, martial splendor of a military fortress. The young lieutenant, under fire for the first time, runs away. His father mourns him as dead, and when he returns in the night his young wife turns from him, but guards his secret. Later, he redeems the honor of the family in a sensational scene, in which the soldiers and Indians engage in a desperate struggle.

CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT

In Three Reels Coming! In Three Reels

The events leading up to the most tragic and heroic incident in the nation's history are reproduced in this wonderful subject, in which a thousand Indians and a thousand soldiers take part. Some of the Indians who participated in the Custer massacre are seen in this film, which is a revelation in sensationalism. We cannot recommend this subject too strongly as an overwhelming feature.

Memories of a Pioneer

One Reel

Released Tuesday, June 11th

A thrilling story, in which the old pioneer lives again the days of his youth when he crossed the wild Western country as an emigrant. The Indians plan to capture the wagon train and a treacherous half-breed secures employment as a guide and tries to lure it into an ambush.

The AMBROSIO release of Friday, June 14, is a split reel, "If I Were King," a gorgeously costumed subject, and "Italian Lakes," unquestionably showing some of the finest photography ever seen on a screen.

Length 1060 Feet

"Fire and Straw"

A beautiful and pathetic tale of the slums, and the wonderful work of the "Mission." Mary Light goes out to save souls, and in the effort loses her heart to one of the most desperate characters of her flock. Love, however, prevails and a prospective jail-bird becomes a worthy and devoted sweetheart.

Released Thursday, June 13th, 1912
Length 1059 Feet

"An Indian's Gratitude"

Circumstancial evidence has over and over again caused suffering to innocent people, but in the end the old saying that "Murder will out" brings vindication. This Photo Play vividly illustrates the righting of a wrong through the evidence of a grateful Indian which brings happiness to a worthy man and his sweetheart.

Released Saturday, June 15th, 1912 Length 1060 Feet

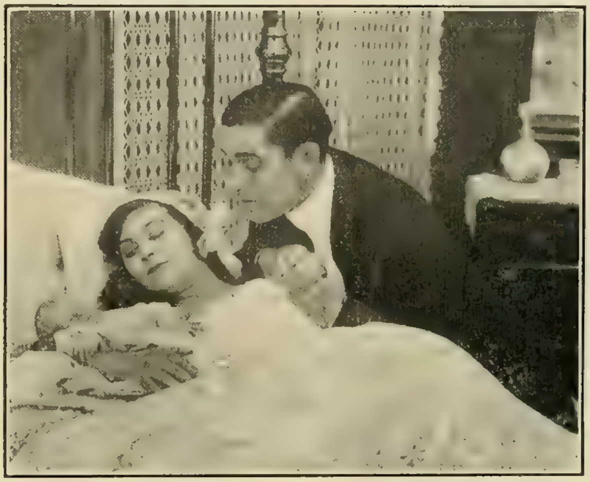
"HER GIFT"



John Gregory, broker, is pressed to the wall by a flurry in the cotton market. He borrows $50,000 from a banker on a three-day note; still being pressed, he asks for an extension of time, but the banker, who has unfair designs on John's wife, refuses. The wife, having much jewelry and diamonds, borrows the sum needed from a diamond broker and pays the note. Next day a shortage of cotton is reported and Gregory cleans up a fortune.

Released Monday, June 17th, 1912
Length 1060 Feet

The Choir of Densmore

Nellie Perry, her husband and little boy of three months, tho poor, are happy until by an accident Perry is killed. Nellie with the aid of an aunt and the Rev. Dr. Belden gets a position in a country church choir. Her wonderful singing causes a jealousy and the gossips of the choir raise a question about the child. The minister, however, being advised of the true circumstances, addresses the congregation and Nellie is taken warmly back into the fold.

EXTREMELY BEAUTIFUL ONE and THREE SHEET POSTERS of our PHOTO-PLAYS, printed in FIVE COLORS, can be obtained from the A. B. C. COMPANY, CLEVELAND, OHIO. These handsome bills will offer a GREAT ADVANTAGE to your Theatre.

The Helen Gardner Picture Players

THE first picture in which Miss Gardner will appear in her own company of players will be a five-reel presentation of "Cleopatra."

Her support will be consistent and capable. Dramatically and scenically the production will be an innovation in the picture art. It will move smoothly and inevitably to the tragic crisis. It will be as rich and sumptuous as money and cultured taste can accomplish. It will be as interesting and dramatic as the best talent in the world can make it. Miss Gardner's beautiful personality will saturate it. "Cleopatra" will be a free and liberal adaptation and co-ordination of the plays of Shakespeare and Victorien Sardou. Technically, from the picture play point of view, it will be a work of splendid power. It will live as a blaze in the memory of all who see it on the screen.

Following "Cleopatra" will come regular bi-weekly releases of similar plays, all of them having been written in the original for Miss Gardner. Nearly all of them are five-reel productions—three will require six reels. Several are Biblical stories, "The Wife of Cain" and "Jeptha's Daughter" being classics. "The Wife of Juda" will also take its place permanently in motion picture literature.

All of these plays are ambitious, powerful, gripping, convincing stories, beautifully and dramatically told. They are the sort that men and women of understanding love to see, the sort that elevate the begrimed lowlings and force beauty and grandeur into their lives and understandings.

The Helen Gardner Picture Players will address themselves more particularly to enlightened people—who even now make up the larger part of all respectable picture theatre audiences, and who complain loudly at the nonsense drooled out to them by the trusts.

Confident that merit and quality must always win, Miss Gardner approaches her labor with courage, absolutely certain of success.

TO AGENTS AND EXHIBITORS:

Get on our mailing list at once. The productions of The Helen Gardner Picture Players, consisting of four and five-reel works, such as "Cleopatra," "Lucretia Borgia," "Galatea," "Sappho," and original stories written especially for Miss Gardner, will be big winners and big money-earners.

Such productions will fill your houses, not for a day and night, but for weeks.

Nothing yet undertaken in the motion picture art has been greater than the work undertaken by Miss Gardner and her company.

The day of the mushy love piffle usually infecting the one-reel subject has passed, as well as the day of the very funny "Western" drama and the melancholy "comedy."

The demand is for virile drama—picture plays that will entertain a whole evening, and that tell mighty stories and romances.

None know this better than exhibitors.

Motion pictures have passed the swaddling clothes period.

The big winners to-day are the big productions.

The "low-brow" picture patron has gone.

It is doubtful if he ever was.

A new sun is rising.

All of the old-fashioned producing companies are stumbling over each other's big feet to get out of the way of each other in the production of big stories.

They are like chickens among which one worm has been distributed.

They can't all get the worm.

Some must eat sand.

If those old-fashioned people can't give you what your patrons want, cut 'em out.

That's what they'd do to you if you couldn't give them what they want.

You all know Miss Gardner—you all know that your patrons love her, and love to see her in pictures, and you do yourself.

You know that she is a great picture actress.

Well, this is to tell you that she now has a great company of her own, and that she will produce great stories in which she does great work.

Nothing could be simpler.

Write for our literature. . . And place your orders for the first five-reel release, "Cleopatra," in which Miss Gardner herself plays the title-role.

"LULU'S DOCTOR" Monday, June 10th

A special case. Two aching hearts, two longing hearts. United by the simple faith of a child in her doctor. He mends her doll and she mends the breach between her auntie and the doctor.

"PANDORA'S BOX" Tuesday, June 11th

Full of life. An inquisitive maid gets the lovers all mixed up. Things are straightened out when she opens a box filled with mice and lets the cat out of the bag. A lively comedy of fun and frolic.

"YELLOW BIRD" Wednesday, June 12th

Beautiful in every detail. A thoughtless forester trifles with the affections of an Indian maiden. In revenge, she steals his infant daughter, who years later marries an Indian brave. The white man spurned the Indian girl; his own daughter, not knowing her father, spurns him.

"THE LIGHT THAT FAILED" Friday, June 14th

It strikes home every time. Conflict between employer and employees leads to sad consequences. Reason should not be unthroned by selfish motives, violence or revenge.

"DAYS OF TERROR" Saturday, June 15th

Thrilling plot. The struggle between the masses and the classes, during the French Revolution. Magnificently costumed, dramatically acted. Something exceptional. A feature.

Facts and Comments

RARE and precious is the man who dares to speak out against a false notion which is firmly entrenched in the minds of the vulgar or ignorant. Mayor Gaynor has flashes of this sort of righteousness. When he decided in favor of a proper Sunday exhibition of motion pictures he took occasion to rebuke and enlighten the fanatical Sabbatarians. Whenever anywhere a man of prominence and standing in his community speaks in the same vein and lifts his voice in defense of the Sunday exhibition of moving pictures he deserves to be quoted and duly credited in these columns, which are devoted to the best interests of the industry! In Ensley, Alabama, an agitation was started recently against keeping the picture theaters open on Sunday. Human owls hooted out of their medieval darkness and raised the cry of "desecration of the Sabbath." Thereupon Dr. George Evans, the "most beloved and popular pastor in town," as the local papers put it, gently, but not without force and emphasis, reminded the Sabbatarians "that it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day." He dwells on the intolerance of those who would deny the recreation of the mind which the pictures give to the poor as well as the rich. "The very people," he says, "who won't allow the shows open for the poor man have Sunday suppers and parties or at least easy and comfortable places where there are books and pictures. Do they go to church on Sunday night? They do not. They need no picture theater. But the homeless boy with nothing to do, the man who has a poor and comfortless place, may not go to see the pictures or hear the music. We ought to have the best films showing the best things and running on Sunday nights if demanded. We ought to use Sunday nights to teach people what is best." We welcome the Rev. Dr. George Evans into the host of enlightened and Christian friends of the motion picture. It is a safe guess that motion pictures, properly selected and presented, will continue to be shown on Sundays in the place where he is pastor. Such views expressed by such men give a tremendous momentum to the movement for a liberal and useful Sunday and greatly influence public opinion everywhere.

IN view of the absurd zeal of the local Board of Aldermen to "improve and reform" moving pictures and the places where they are exhibited, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD feels bound to lay renewed stress on its suggestion that if there is to be any official regulation of moving pictures at all, it should be in the hands of the State authorities rather than in the power of a hundred conflicting, petty jurisdictions. It will be well for organized exhibitors, who plan legislative action in the near future, to bear this advice in mind. State control is both more effective and more dignified. It means as a rule a better and more responsible class of officials. State officials are in more direct touch with the chief executive of the state, who can be appealed to in case of a gross abuse of power. The control of a state board over moving pictures should at all times be subject to judicial review. It should also be provided that the industry itself is to have representation on the board either in the person of an exhibitor or manufacturer of moving pictures. There is no doubt that state regulation, even where it conferred limited powers of censorship, would bring about changes for good. Petty graft could be eliminated; arbitrary and ill-considered decisions, harsh and literal enforcement of drastic legislation would be less likely to occur, and there would be a uniform system of license fees, properly graded according to the size of the cities. Many of us will remember what a fruitful source of corruption the liquor traffic was in this state while it was regulated by local ordinance. Ever since the state has assumed exclusive control there has been a profound change for the better. As "reforming agencies" the yellow journals and the New York Board of Aldermen belong in about the same class.

OUR emphatic and repeated demand for historical accuracy in pictures purporting to portray events and incidents of history is ably seconded by M. F. Laurent, a well-known French writer, who gives considerable attention to this subject in a recent article which is published in "Le Cinema." He speaks of the grosser sort of inaccuracies in pictures of ancient history. "For certain directors Egypt, Rome, Assyria, Greece are all one. Sesostris wears an Athenian chlamys and the togas instead of their ancient simplicity show all kinds of modern and complicated designs. . . . Other periods, however, fare not much better, as for instance the Middle Ages, the Renaissance and the beginning of the modern era. It is no uncommon thing to see costumes and furniture which are at least a century out of the way." We could name shocking departures from history in a number of "historic" films. Instead we will note with pleasure that in depicting scenes from the Revolutionary and Civil Wars at least three of our American companies have at times shown a degree of care and accuracy which comes close to perfection. It seems to us that for the purposes of the film-maker both the periods named still offer an abundance of materials. Nothing takes with an American audience like a true American picture.

While on this subject, it might be pointed out to producers of historic subjects that they had best confine themselves to the history of their own nation and avoid others, except the history of the ancients. A French producer will do best with French historic subjects, and the portrayal of American history may safely be left to Americans. Again and again have we seen French and Italian producers of great ability fail wretchedly in an attempt to visualize episodes of English history. The intention of these producers is excellent, their actors do the best they can, they strive after correctness of detail in the matter of costumes and furniture, but they are utterly incapable of either understanding or reproducing the national characteristics of other nations. Recently, we have seen an attempt to pay a cinematographic tribute to the memory of John Milton. It was worse than a failure; it was a travesty. It is difficult to overestimate the harm that is done by such pictures. The number of intelligent and educated patrons of the motion picture is steadily increasing. Nothing is more calculated to alienate their loyalty to the picture and make them turn with disgust from the motion picture theatre than the production of shockingly false and preposterous so-called historic pictures, especially where they offend against the traditions and the common knowledge of a race or nation. The name of John Milton is sacred to the ears of the English-speaking race. It is quite fair to assume that ten per cent. at least of the average audience to-day have a good and even accurate knowledge of his life and his character. Now, in this picture the great poet is represented as an insufferable ranter, theatrical in the extreme, full of furious gesticulation. The Milton of English history is an entirely different personage. We know him for his lofty faith, his noble resignation, his sublime calm in the midst of reverses and afflictions. We think of him clothed with dignity as with a garment. It hurts us to see him parodied, even when we know that there is no intention to do so. We say nothing of the fact that the plot of the story is not only pure invention, but clumsy and improbable as well, or that the costuming in parts is absolutely wrong. These objections alone would be enough to condemn the picture, but they might have been forgiven more easily than the burlesque on the character of one of the greatest of all Englishmen. The Moving Picture World believes it to be an unavoidable duty to take exception to this kind of historic pictures. They make the art of cinematography ridiculous. Better far to keep away from historic subjects altogether than mangle and tear them into tatters. We propose to keep a close watch on historic pictures, and for the sake of the dignity of the art and the educational importance of the thing we shall continue protesting against the mongrel historic pictures. They are an effense to the educated public and a burden to the exhibitor.

A FUND of about three thousand dollars has been raised in Germany for the purpose of fighting the enemies of the motion picture. The principal contributors to this fund are the manufacturers. Out of a total list of seventeen manufacturers who have contributed substantially to this fund three are Americans with no European branch, but a good European market; seven either have plants both here and abroad or have a recognized standing in the American market. We observe the names of Gaumont, Pathe Freres, Cines, Essanay, Vitagraph, Imp, Eclair, Great Northern in the list. The idea of raising this war-fund was started by exhibitors and is directed against "arbitrary officials," "the libels on motion pictures spread by the daily press," as well as "against prejudice generally." A committee of six has been put in charge of this campaign of publicity for the defence of the motion picture. This committee consists of men prominently identified with the cinematographic journals of the empire. We gather from the proposed program of agitation that the committee will report weekly to the contributors and the industry at large as to the progress of the work. It is expected that the fund will swell to generous proportions, "for," as the circular to the industry states, "the number of our enemies is considerable, and every person connected with the industry ought to contribute." The circular states further that the "unjust and unjustifiable attacks against the motion picture have created a feeling of insecurity among exhibitors and manufacturers and have compelled united action among the journalistic representatives of the industry." Conditions in our country are such that a movement of this sort could be started at any time through the medium of the National League. While things have improved here and the prejudice is gradually dying out, a newspaper crusade or a self-advertising official or reformer or "a wave of public sentiment" may have to be met at any time

Lest We Forget

WE are well aware that our readers who are most closely in touch with actual conditions in the moving picture field do not need any reminder from us as to present conditions in the moving picture industry when compared with three or four years ago. The steady, substantial increase in popular favor of moving pictures all over the country, their increasing favor in educational circles and the gradual decrease of the antipathy and contempt of former years is plainly evident to all who care to see—and why?

Why is the public demand for censorship greatly increasing rather than diminishing in Europe and especially in Germany at the present moment? True, the so-called legitimate stage is bending every energy to discredit the pictures on the Continent. True, also, the upper classes have more influence in such matters in these countries. Nevertheless, if popular opinion was overwhelmingly in favor of the pictures, as it now is in this country, these attacks on the pictures would have as little effect as they have here. Is it not because the standard of the photoplay has not been raised by both manufacturers and exhibitors as it has been here? Is it not because those who are fighting the pictures over there have still so much that is objectionable to point at, that the industry is in such an unpromising and discouraging condition, especially from the exhibitor's point of view?

Can it be that there is still in the ranks of either manufacturers or exhibitors in this country one who does not realize that the surest way to kill the goose that lays the golden egg is to lower our present ideals and standards or go back to conditions of even a couple of years ago. Is it not true that the manufacturers and exhibitors who are reaping the golden harvest to-day and who are even carrying all the others along with them are the ones who are making and showing the best pictures from a moral, educational and ethical standpoint? Does not one picture of low moral tone and with objectionable situations undo at one fell blow the confidence of our theater-going public, give those who are clamoring for stricter censorship more material for argument and raise a question in the minds of our leading educators as to the advisability of linking an instrument of questionable reputation with the great cause of education?

Popular and great as is the magnitude of the industry in this country to-day, it is only an indication of what it may and will be if we only keep increasing the present high standard of quality. Clean sport, clean politics, clean business methods, clean cities, clean living is the universal demand. Surely this demand must be met more than anywhere else in the producing and exhibiting of the motion picture, which enters by "eye-gate" into the minds of so many of our population of tender age. Are we all really awake to our possibilities? Certainly not one of us can measure them fully and foretell the magnitude of the industry in the next decade. The future of the business depends on the product of to-day, and the Moving Picture World believes that the ever-increasing improvement of the productions of the American film manufacturers insures for many years to come the continued growth of this most popular form of public entertainment.

BIG KALEM FEATURE COMING.

The Kalem Company announces that it has sold to the General Film Company a big two-reel African feature picture entitled "Tragedy of the Desert," which will be released by the latter company on July 1st. This is a thrilling picture taken on the desert near Luxor, Egypt, and will prove a great money getter.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League
OF AMERICA

TO NEW YORK STATE EXHIBITORS.

THE Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of New York will hold a convention in New York City at the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth Street and Fourth Avenue, Wednesday, June 19, 1912. The convention will be called to order at 10 o'clock A. M., by M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. A large attendance is expected; over two thousand invitations have been sent out to the exhibitors throughout the State of New York. Every exhibitor is requested to attend the convention whether he has received a letter or not.

This convention is held for the purpose of organizing the motion picture exhibitors of New York into a State organization, which will co-operate and affiliate with the National Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America. Matters which vitally interest the motion picture exhibitors will be discussed at this meeting.

This is to be a strictly business meeting for the purpose of getting together, so that the exhibitors may become acquainted and, through a strong vigorous organization, cooperate for the uplift of cinematography and the protection of the exhibitors' commercial rights and the advancement of the exhibitors' interests. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is the rock upon which the whole business rests. Many who were at first antagonistic to the organization now realize that it is based upon the high principle of justice to all and a fair, square deal to each and every one engaged in our line of business. This is a day and age of organization and big things; the individual in the commercial world is but a grain of sand upon the beach. An injury to one exhibitor would be the concern of all exhibitors, therefore every exhibitor's interests can be looked after and every grievance adjusted honestly and fairly through organization.

I wish to urge the importance of every motion picture exhibitor in the State of New York attending the meeting to be held on June 19, 1912, in New York City, at the Union Square Hotel. A National Vice-President will be elected who will represent the great State of New York in the councils of the National Organization. A State President, First Vice-President, Second Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer will be elected, and several important committees are to be elected. Do not wait to read about the convention, but let history record the fact that you were one of the charter members that linked your interests with hundreds of others who acted together to bring about a friendly co-operation through an organization that has proven to the world that it is capable of dealing efficiently with all things and conditions pertaining to the motion picture business.

Do not forget the day and date and the place of meeting, Wednesday, June 19, 1912, at the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City, New York. Let the Slogan be "On to New York, where we will make history." Any one desiring information in regard to the convention will please write to Mr. M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, 1003 Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

M. A. NEFF,
President M. P. E. L. of America.

NOTES FROM CINCINNATI.

Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is doing things all the time. Their new code, which is to be presented to the City Council, will be completed at their next meeting. All the members of Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 have agreed upon issuing a pass to their friends which is good at fifty-one (51) theaters; in other words, one of these passes will admit the holder to fifty-one theaters in Cincinnati and Hamilton county. This pass is issued by the Local instead of the individual theater owners. Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 is growing very fast, new members coming in at every meeting. Big arrangements are being made to go to Toledo to attend the State Convention, which is to be held there July 16 and 17, 1912. It is also making arrangements to attend the Chicago Convention, which will be held August 13, 1912.

Mr. Chas. T. Beeching, of the Orpheum Theater, a member of Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2, has been in Chicago several days. The Worldorf Amusement Company, composed of some of the leading business men of Cincinnati, are erecting two first-class moving picture theaters; one will seat 800 and the other one 600. All of the Worldorf Amusement Company's stockholders are members of the Local League. Mr. Otto Luedeking, who is president of the company, is also treasurer of the local organization.

Dr. Kolb, president of the Empire Theater Company, will open a new motion picture theater, at Fifteenth and Vine Streets, Cincinnati, Ohio, June 6, 1912. Dr. Kolb is a member of Local Branch No. 2 and his company is building several new theaters in Cincinnati. Mr. August Carbin, vice-president of Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2, is now running the Gayety Theater, at Fountain Square and Fifth Street, which is one of the most prominent theaters in Cincinnati.

Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 met at the Sinton Hotel, on Wednesday, May 29, 1912, and transacted a large amount of important business. Mr. Orene Parker, National Vice-President, from Kentucky, and several other visiting exhibitors were present.

K. and C. Local Branch No. 2, of the State of Kentucky, held a meeting at the Industrial Club, Covington, Ky., on Tuesday, June 4, and elected permanent officers. Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the National League, was present, and addressed the Local League. Mr. Dittman, of the Majestic Theater, Louisville, Ky., reports that Louisville Local Branch No. 1 is in a prosperous condition, and that he is working in the interest of his local organization. Mr. J. H. Tamper, Jr., President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky, reports that they are doing effective work in the State of Kentucky, and that two organizers have been put in the field to secure new members.

A new local is to be organized in Portsmouth, Ohio, this week, which will be known as Portsmouth Local Branch No. 6, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. A new local will also be organized in Chillicothe; in the near future, Youngstown, Springfield, Akron and Lima, Ohio, will also be organized.

Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, left Cincinnati, Thursday, May 30, for Chicago, where he attended a banquet at the La Salle Hotel, which was given by the Chicago executive committee on convention arrangements. It was a grand affair and everybody was highly pleased with the progress being made for holding the National Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which is to be held in Chicago next August.

Mr. C. M. Christenson, National Secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Cleveland, Ohio, met Mr. M. A. Neff at the La Salle Hotel, Saturday morning in company with Messrs. R. R. Levy, Wm. J. Sweeney and L. Schindler. They went to Milwaukee, Wis., where they attended a big banquet given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Wisconsin at the Plankinton Hotel, Saturday noon. Every one had a most enjoyable time. Mr. M. A. Neff, National President; C. M. Christenson, National Secretary; L. Schindler, Chicago; Wm. J. Sweeney, Chicago, and R. R. Levy, of Chicago, addressed the convention. Mr. Klein introduced the toastmaster, Mr. C. H. Phillips. After the banquet a group picture was taken, automobile rides and a visit to several of the picture theaters. At 6 o'clock the delegation returned to Chicago. Mr. Neff returned to Cincinnati, and Mr. Christenson to Cleveland.

PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

The Pennsylvania State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which will meet in Pittsburg on June 24th and 25th, is attracting not only the attention of Pennsylvania exhibitors, but a large number from adjoining States will attend. Pittsburg, no doubt, will have the largest attendance of any convention heretofore held, and it is confidently expected that the entertainment will surpass all previous attempts made by conventions of this kind.

Studio Saunterings

By Louis Reeves Harrison

IN approaching a studio or an office you may find yourself dealing with a raw specimen of humanity at the outset—you can make up your mind there and then that you will come upon some half-baked ones further on. And the contrary is true. If you are treated with courtesy and consideration from the outset, as I was when I sauntered over to the Solax studio at Flushing, you can count upon it that some one of enlightenment and superior breeding is high in control of affairs. In this case, the head of the business, the originator of it, the capitalist, the art director, the chief working director, is a refined French woman, Madame Alice Blache.

This is woman's era, and Madame Blache is helping to prove it without making any fuss at all. She only favors universal suffrage when satisfied that women are ready for it, and she is so modest about what she has done in the Gaumont and Solax companies that I had to depend upon others for any details relating to her remarkable career in the production of moving pictures. Modesty is the most endearing quality woman ever shows to man, egotism being his specialty and most pronounced characteristic, and along with it the head of the Solax Company exhibits a delightful composure of manner under all circumstances, no matter how trying. The average business man imagines that he enhances his importance by exhibiting that enemy of politeness, haste, as if the tremendous responsibility of making a living kept him in a state of constant high pressure.

I have been in studios where there was no inherent lack of appreciation of the value of publicity, but those in control assume that old you'll-have-to-excuse-me air, as though a momentary diversion of energy would cause the entire commercial structure collapse, and those men of small ability to meet contingencies are the first to complain that they are never able to attract attention. At the Solax, I was personally conducted by gentle-mannered Levine, editor of "The Magnet," and so well treated from start to finish that my work became a pleasure. Levine realized that I was not at the studio as an individual, but as the representative of the only periodical generally regarded as an established authority on moving pictures in this country. He is a live wire.

From Levine, and from others, I learned that Madame Alice Blache became associated with the Gaumont Company very early in the game, when Mr. Gaumont was absorbed with the scientific department of production or merely engaged in photographing moving objects. She inaugurated the presentation of little plays on the screen by that company some sixteen or seventeen years ago, operating the camera, writing or adapting the photodramas, setting the scenes and handling the actors. I had an opportunity to see how efficient she was in her diversity of roles before the day was over and was amazed at her skill, especially in directing the action of a complicated scene. She came to this country in 1907—her husband then being general manager of the Gaumont Company in America—and established an entirely independent organization, having no connection with the older one, and launched it successfully as the Solax Company.

When I reached the present studio—a new one is in process of construction across the Hudson in New Jersey—Madame Blache and a large body of actors and actresses had gone some distance into sylvan scenes of Long Island for the purpose of producing in the sunlight several acts of "Fra Diavolo," a large photodrama adapted from Auber's opera of the same name. I went immediately to the base of operations in an automobile with Levine and came upon a fully-equipped stage set up in the open, with Madame Blache conducting rehearsals from an elevated camera platform.

The scene from the south was an inn interior, presumably that of L'Hôtellerie de Terracine, but it was a two-faced arrangement, the north side representing the entrance of the hostelry. From within one could look out into the open and note the approach on horseback of the famous Calabrian bandit (Billie Quirk in this instance), and his action at the entrance could be depicted from either an exterior or from an interior point of view, a most ingenious disposition of the entire structure. On the stage at the moment was jovial George Paxton in the role of a richard, a pompous gentleman of wealth, with seduissante Miss Simpson as his young and attractive wife and inn loungers, all seated at tables, while picturesque waiters and waitresses, fresh from the opera, enlivened the effect with their gay costumes.

The entire group was a glowing palette of color, a bright and warm costume treatment against an interesting background, with an especially well designed fireplace as the striking decorative feature, but the thing calculated to make us forget the theater was the glimpse of nature through the open door of the inn. There is an abundance of movement in the scene, which becomes intensified when innkeeper Foy announces to his servants that another traveler is in sight. Sure enough, there is Billie Quirk in the title role riding up to the entrance from the near distance. There is a stir over his entrance; the young wife notices the handsome stranger; the elderly husband regards the newcomer contemptuously; Fra Diavolo orders refreshments and the action becomes extremely complicated, especially in the small scope of the foreground where the principals are gathered.

It is to be expected that Fannie Simpson, Billie Quirk and George Paxton will carry on their parts with intelligence and harmony of relation, but there are a half dozen or more others to fit in and not complicate matters; the director's eyes have to be everywhere. Madame Blache gives her signals with as much ease and composure as though there had been a month of dress rehearsals. She is never ruffled, never agitated; never annoyed by the obtrusive efforts of minor characters to thrust themselves into prominence. With a few simple directions, uttered without apparent emotion, she handles the interweaving movements like a military leader might the maneuvers of an army. "I like American actors and actresses," she said brightly; "they are so willing to do as they are told and take such a live interest in what they are doing."

I was surprised to hear her say that—every little girl and boy in France seems to be born with the dramatic instinct. "Are they as good as the French?" I asked. "Quite as good," she assured me, "and so much more pliable. It is pleasure to train them." The secret of it lies in her own sweetness of manner and inexhaustible patience. I could have hurled several two-edged epithets at a waiter who kept thrusting into the main action. The directress has that essence of politeness, a very kind heart. She accomplishes gently what a man would attempt by stinging sarcasm. I could not help recalling what the distinguished British statesman, orator and writer, Edmund Burke, once said.

"Manners are more important than laws. They vex or soothe, barbarize or refine us, by the constant and insensible operation of the air we breathe. They give form and color to our lives."

Rehearsal of the interior scenes had been concluded, the detached platform was occupied by Madame Blache, the camera man and myself, there was some talk of adjourning for lunch, when the wildest kind of a scene was enacted before our eyes, only a few feet from the structure to be photographed. Some horses attached to an old-fashioned stage had been standing unattended in the sunlight when they took fright and dashed straight for the prospective stage of Fra Diavolo's misdeeds. They started another unattached team of horses, became entangled in an uprearing and mad struggle, stagehands and actors in costume dashed into the perilous situation, and it looked as though a vast amount of damage would shortly result. With all that going on the camera man stood inactive where a newspaper photographer would have used every reel in his machine. Perhaps he was afraid to use the moving-picture camera, as it was not his own, but a more animated picture could not have been prepared.

One team finally escaped and made a bee line for the spot where a number of performers, including little Magda and her mother, were sitting while waiting their turns or watching the rehearsal, veered from this fatal course, and ran away toward Flushing. The bed of a moving picture actor is not always one of roses. The company sought a shady nook, and I asked the enterprising camera man to snap a shot at a picturesque group of principals gathered together under the trees—they were occupied in appeasing the never-failing professional appetite. I now had opportunity of renewing acquaintance with the tiniest tot of three, who appeared in "The Little Major."

Little Magda has improved to such an extent since she appeared with Helen Anderson in "The Little Major"—she could barely toddle through her part then—that she has become an accomplished actress. She was a comical baby then, though very pretty, and she gave no signs of possessing histrionic ability—it was all we could do to make her keep her eyes shut when she was supposed to be asleep. I was amazed, therefore, when I watched her act on the Solax stage a few weeks ago, to see her perform with intelligence and feeling far beyond her tender years. This remarkable change is probably due to an unusual environment, both her mother and her father appearing regularly in the photodrama.

Magda's parents keep her strong and healthy—off stage she is nothing but a sturdy, romping child—and they do not deplete her energy by shutting her up in some ill-ventilated school. Yet she is brighter than most kidlets of her age and is building the physical strength in this formative period that she will need later on in life. She has an ability that grown-ups often lack, that of concentrating her attention upon what she is doing while the picture of her movements is being taken—she can fix her mind upon the subject in hand better than many mature women—and seems to act correctly in a difficult situation from instinct. This serious work has not in the least spoiled the little girl. She is simply a happy child of tender heart and strong natural affections, more like a restless and vigorous little boy than a repressed girl, and her conduct is just as natural as if she had never played some difficult leading roles. She is what children should be.

After lunch in the woods came the actual performance of part of "Fra Diavolo" as it will appear on the screen.

Scene from "Fra Diavolo," Produced by the Solax Company.

It always sets me on edge, like a close ring fight or anxious game of ball, to watch the performers in action while the moving picture is being taken. The smallest error may result in doing the entire scene over again, there is a feeling of suspense like that awakened by old-fashioned melodrama, when it looks as though the heroine would get her head sawed off, and one experiences relief when all turns out well. To repress my excitement, I fastened my attention upon a string of garlic hanging in this Italian inn, supposedly to give it "atmosphere," and waited. There was only one slip. That same waiter obtruded where he was not required and the whole scene had to be done over again from the beginning.

I was glad to see Madame Blache insist upon good conduct among members of her company—this she did firmly, though her methods are invisible—for actors are not particularly strong on manners. Only recently it was asserted by a prominent New York manager that not an actor in this city could conduct himself on the stage, not even walk across it, like a plain ordinary gentleman. Old Socks-and-Buskin is still fond of spats and the matinee idol cannot leave his silk hat home when he goes to the country. In moving picture companies there is a tendency to play to the camera, which robs a performance of intense effect.

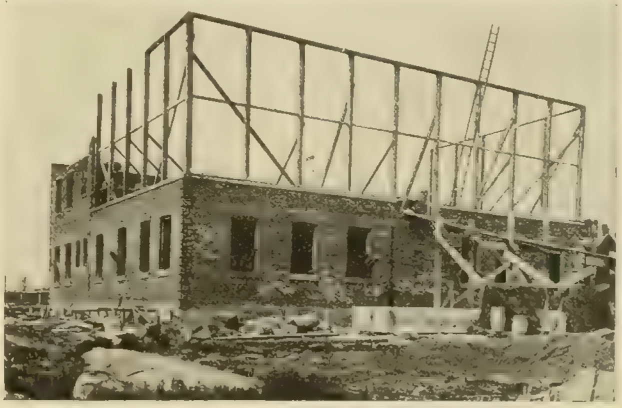
The Stage Coach Used in "Fra Diavolo."

In a highly emotional photodrama I should like to see the performers enter more deeply into the spirit of the story, express as closely as possible the vexations and petty anxieties of actual existence more than they do. These are quite as effective as murderous glances out the corners of eyes or copious weeping in moments of sorrow. Thousands of people show fortitude in trial or trouble, though the suppressed emotion may leave its character traces on the countenance. The great idea is to indicate clearly though delicately what is passing in the mind at an intense moment, and this can be best done by feeling as the character would under the circumstances.

I would like very much to have a woman of such exceptional taste as the head of the Solax Company make a study of our beautiful country homes from both an outer and an inner point of view, not the pitiful humbug that goes on at watering places. The esthetic tendency of American women has been highly cultivated during the last ten or fifteen years by really wonderful periodicals such as "Country Life," devoted to describing successful homes with illustrations of correct interiors. The photodramas show absolutely none of these except when taken in Los Angeles, and the selections there seem to be made at random.

A Frenchman will easily set a French interior—that is largely a question of periods—and the same is true of a cultivated English director, but our audiences are compelled to look at veritable abortions for our own settings—they look as though they came from a second-hand store or junk shop—and this is so offensive that many of the best people are driven from the little theaters by the hideous and repulsive furniture and drapings of "home" interiors. Correct scenes, representatively American in the best sense of the word, would greatly enhance any brand of moving pictures both here and abroad. It must be remembered that the visual appeal is all in all, these are pictures, and to have great power they must be consistent.

Cheap-looking colonials have been used to the point of nausea, and as it would not be possible to enter the true American houses where dinners, dances and week's-end parties are given in a brilliant social atmosphere, the surest guide can only be found in the great periodicals given over to illustrating the delightful interior life of American people. The fresh and original beauty of these homes would contribute tremendously to the charm of moving pictures and give the first producer of them a Tiffany-like standing in this country and abroad.



New Solax Factory at Fort Lee, N. J., Under Construction.

I was loath to leave Madame Blache and her happy family of brave men and fair women, but the declining sun reminded me that I had a long journey before me, and we poor scribes have to do our work at all hours, so I reluctantly said goodbye. I was, however, cheered on my way by the last words of sweet little Magda:

"When r'you comin' again?"

FUNNY THINGS THAT HAPPEN IN THE STUDIO.

As there are over 400 people in the Lubin plant, birthdays are of frequent occurrence. However, two rather important ones have been celebrated in the past week—Peter Lang, May 29th, and Charles Brandt, May 27th, both juvenile men of the Studio Stock. The respective ages, over 50, have been carefully suppressed. Both of the boys were the recipients of nice gifts from friends, among others Brandt received a Hamilton gold watch worth at least $125. The most valued present received by Lang was a gold medal from Siegmund Lubin, the design being the Lubin Bell. Lang is very proud of it and has three times shown it to the press agent.

CHANGE IN GAUMONT RELEASE DATES.

The Gaumont Company announces a change in its release dates from Sundays and Thursdays, as heretofore, to Tuesdays and Thursdays, commencing with the week of Tuesday, June 11th, on which date is released "Nanine, the Artist's Wife," a one-reel black and white production. The change from Sunday to Tuesday allows an improvement in the weekly program of the Film Supply Company of America by offering some of the Gaumont hand-colored, lion pictures, and two-reel features on the first of the week.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THE question, "What benefit will be derived from the approaching convention of exhibitors at Chicago?", is being asked by many at the present time. It has been put to me by several people who are not quite satisfied that there will be any benefit, that is, commensurate with expenditures in the form of donations and otherwise that are expected from film manufacturers and exchanges for the occasion, and in the expenses incurred by local exhibitors and by those who will attend from faraway points.

If the convention meant only that a "good time" is guaranteed visitors, then the resulting benefit would be incommensurate with the outlay. So would it be were the main object of the convention one of mere enlargement of the membership of tne Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. There must be a more vital object in view to make the convention worth the labor, time and expense laid out in preparations, and one that will insure lasting benefit.

What is this vital object? Is it not that the exhibition department of the film industry shall be directly benefited by the interchange of opinions of exhibitors East and West, and North and South; that a spirit of greater emulation to excel in presenting pictures shall be created; that resolutions shall be honestly made by those present to do all in their power to make the picture theater a blessing to the nation and not a menace?

It seems that certain members of the National League are already prone to attend to outside matters rather than to their own housecleaning. They are devoting themselves to petty matters instead of engaging in the big tasks that are worth while. They are appealing to the smaller and not the nobler instincts of their fellow members. These men seek to build a lasting edifice on foundations of sand; but among the exhibitors of the country there are men, many of them, that can and will build so wisely and so strongly that the National League of Exhibitors will become a powerful regulator of the evils that retard the progress and uplift of the moving picture theater.

Chain of First-Class Houses for De Luxe Pictures.

S. L. Rothapfel, who won eminence as a presenter of motion pictures in the Alhambra, Milwaukee, and in the Lyric, Minneapolis, has been appointed general manager of a chain of first-class theaters, which will shortly present motion pictures de luxe. These houses for the present include the Lyric, Chicago; the Boyd, Omaha; the Shubert theaters in St. Paul, Kansas City and St. Joseph, Mo.; the Garrick, St. Louis; the Lyric, Minneapolis, and the Grand, Atlanta. These high-class theaters are all on the Shubert circuit, and, if the venture proves a financial success, other houses on the circuit will be added until the number reaches twenty-six.

The Lyric, Chicago, the largest and highest priced Shubert house in the city, will be the first to open under the new policy, the opening date being Sunday, June 9th. Mr. Rothapfel, at the time of writing, has already made complete arrangements for the first week's program. The weekly program will consist of two parts. The first part will be devoted to topical, scenic and educational films; the second to special three-reel features. Seven reels will be used for each program and only weekly changes will be made.

Pathe's Weekly will always be included in the first part of the programs. The first program will also include "The Tale of Two Cities," "Shriners' Pilgrimage at Los Angeles," and "Scenes From the Turkish-Italian War."

The orchestra will consist of ten pieces and a large pipe organ, every musician being an experienced soloist. A high-class quartet and two solo singers have been engaged to appear during intermission. Care has also been taken in providing for sound-effect accompaniments of the Rothapfel type.

Chicago is to be congratulated on the advent of Rothapfel's De Luxe Pictures. Presented amid the most favorable surroundings by a man whose natural talent and acquired taste for such work easily places him at the head of all exhibitors in the country, motion pictures will attain a prominence and importance hitherto denied them here. Many thousands of cultured people, who have feared to enter a five-cent house and who have been out of touch with the marvelous progress and beauties of motography, will attend the Lyric and become ardent supporters of motion pictures. Let us hope that the rather out-of-the-way location of the Lyric will be easily overcome by the Belasco art of Rothapfel, in the presentation of pictures.

Admission prices at the Lyric will be 25 and 50 cents.

Municipality Runs Picture Show.

Haven, a small town in Reno County, Kansas, is believed to have the only municipal moving picture show in the country. Haven is so small that no private concern would operate there. Traveling picture shows came occasionally, but that didn't supply the demand; so the city government decided to go into the business and now shows are given every night in the week.

The business men contributed the money to buy the machines, and the city operates them and takes the receipts. After the merchants had been reimbursed, the city took all the receipts, and whenever the operations show a profit the shows are given free until the fund is exhausted. The films for the Haven show are changed twice a week.

Up to the present time the shows have been given in the City Hall, but now the city is building an open air theater, which will be paid for out of the receipts.

Paul J. Rainey's African Hunt.

"Have you been in Africa?" is becoming a common question in certain circles here just now; for Rainey's African Hunt is being shown at the Colonial, and the Colonial has become another name for Africa. It takes from 25 cents up to a dollar to follow Rainey's trail and, say, it is well worth ten dollars!

I have seen other African pictures of the true brand, but none of them so thoroughly saturated me with the actual atmosphere of the wilds of the Dark Continent as did these. Dispensing with the scenes showing the safari, the other views created such intense interest, accentuated oftentimes by a succession of thrills, that the five reels were unfolded without any reflection as to the time involved.

Ned Holmes is managing the presentation at the Colonial and is much pleased with the box office receipts for the opening week. Walter Craven added much to the educational value of the films by following the scenes with an interesting and excellently timed lecture. Mr. Craven has the easy conversational style of a well-bred man in a drawing room. He does not aim at effects. He rather is the amiable member of an outing party, who always sees that his friends are kept well informed without boring them.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Harry L. Virden will shortly demonstrate by means of an educational film how his pupil, Walter Coombs, has been taught and the methods employed by Mr. Virden in the education of those who are both deaf and blind. This remarkable film, of 1,400 feet in length, has been made by the Selig Polyscope Co. Mr. Virden, who has devoted his life to educational pursuits, will exhibit this film in some of the leading Licensed theaters in Chicago; also in some of the public schools and colleges. Mr. Virden not only educates but supports Walter, who is now a youth of 17 years.

Commencing June 10th, the Universal Film Mfg. Co. will release 21 reels, three reels of the Eclair product being included in the number stated.

M. A. Neff, national president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, was entertained Friday, May 31st, at the La Salle Hotel, by the members of the National Convention Committee of Chicago, No. 2. Mr. Neff consulted with the committee on several occasions concerning the approaching convention. He visited Milwaukee Saturday, June 1st, and returned to his home city on Sunday.

William Petralous, one of the owners of the Stadium Theater, 18th Street and Blue Island Avenue, was killed Sunday, May 26, by a blow on the head dealt him by the motorman of a street car with a controller handle. Mr. Petralous died the same night. The motorman and the conductor of the car were held without bail pending the inquest. The Chicago Motion Picture Exhibitors' League made arrangements for the funeral and sent a beautiful floral emblem for the coffin. The remains were interred Sunday afternoon, June 2, at Elmwood Cemetery.

Sidney Smith, manager of the Garfield Theater, has been appointed manager of the new Kedzie Annex on West Madison and Kedzie Avenue. This beautiful new house will open July 1st. It seats 900 people. A straight picture program, furnished by the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17 South Wabash, costing $150 per week, will be used. A four-piece orchestra and a large pipe organ, costing $5,000, will play accompaniments for the pictures. The house is owned by the Kedzie Amusement Co. A feature that will be much appreciated during the summer by patrons of this house is a sliding roof that is operated by hydraulic power. The admission prices will be 5 and 10 cents, the seats about equally divided.

Harry B. Fitzpatrick, formerly manager of the Casino Theater for Mr. Weeghman, has purchased the Cupid Theater, 4043 West Madison Street. The Cupid seats 300 people and the admission is 5 cents. Manager Fitzpatrick reports excellent business. He gets his service from the G. F. Co.'s branch at 17 South Wabash. Mr. Fitzpatrick's successor at the Casino is Edward Haselman.

Mayer R. Schlesinger, manager of the Casino Theater, 403 North Clark Street, was discharged recently on a charge of disorderly conduct preferred by Mae Brown, his cashier, who charged that Schlesinger struck and knocked her to the floor in his office when she asked for $38 in wages. The defendant testified Miss Brown called him profane names before an audience.

F. B. Fissinger, traveling representative for the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17 South Wabash, has returned from a trip in the country, during which he visited Springfield, Peoria, Petersburg, Waverly, Gillespie, Athens, Decatur, Auburn, and Rushville, all in Illinois. The Opera House in Waverly, which plays road attractions during the regular season, offered programs of straight moving pictures beginning Monday, June 10, charging 10 cents admission. The new Air Dome was opened at Gillespie, June 12. Business did not seem to be as good, generally, as the same time last year, owing to the late spring, and the consequent business of farmers.

William Boschet has purchased the Erwin Theater, 2816 Lincoln Avenue, from its former owner, Mr. Ford. He reports satisfactory business. Mr. Boschet intends putting in a new front and redecorating the interior some time in August.

Copies of the first number of "The Photoplay," published in Sydney, Australia, reached the Chicago office last week. Issued in the form of a weekly bulletin, about quarto size, with 8 pages, J. D. Williams, of the Greater J. D. Williams' Amusement Co., Sydney, claims that it is "for the promotion and protection of the moving picture business in Australasia." It contains weekly letters from Melbourne, Brisbane and Perth, in addition to synopses of the stories of the various films handled by the aforesaid company's exchanges. "Watch it grow," writes Mr. Williams, in a foreword to exhibitors. American manufacturers of film are largely represented in the product used in Australasia. Louis M. Noto, 2035 Potomac Avenue, Chicago, is the American representative of the Greater J. D. Williams' Amusement Co.

The America's Feature Film Co. announces that a new feature, to be sold on the State rights plan, will be advertised in next week's issue of the World. The film portrays convict life in the Ohio State penitentiary, and is said to be up to the usual high standard of this firm.

J. R. Freuler, general manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, announces that from this time until the first of September, he will spend a great deal of his time in New York in the interests of that company. After that date all exchanges tributary to New York will be under the supervision of a district manager, who will manage the New York office. The executive committee and officers of the company will make Chicago their headquarters and direct work from this city. In the near future, as soon as arrangements can be made, an advertising and publicity department will be installed in the Chicago office. Mr. Freuler states that two exchanges were opened last week, one in Boston and one in Toledo. He also states that the company is now negotiating with eight more, several of them being very prominent exchanges. Mr. Freuler expects that deals will be closed with them very shortly.

"A Nation's Peril" (Pathe)

THE intrigues of diplomatic service contain the nucleus of many a good story, and "A Nation's Peril" is one of them. As the title would indicate, the picture illustrates, to the average citizen, how at all times there are representatives of foreign powers spying upon the defenses of other countries, including our own. It points out the reasons why army discipline must be as strict as it is. One of the favorite tactics of some of the European courts has been to employ women as spies, and to utilize their enchantments and social connections as a means of obtaining information.

Scene from "A Nation's Peril" (Pathe).

Scene from "A Nation's Peril" (Pathe).

The story in question deals with a young army officer who has charge of a fortress. From this fortress are controlled a number of submarine mines, which may be exploded by push-buttons arranged upon a switchboard. All the mines in this harbor have been rearranged and shifted to other positions, and it is information about the new locations of the mines that is wanted by a hostile nation, that is about to declare war. The envoys of that country decide to use one of their female spies in obtaining the information they want. At an embassy ball the woman is introduced to the young officer, and at once the game is on. By feigning an interest in military and garrison life, this charming young woman induces the young officer, in a negative sort of way, to show her about the fortress and explain the workings of the various complicated mechanisms.

Gradually the young officer falls deeply in love with the female spy. The information she sought was gathered little by little, and quite a few days were required in which to do the work. The young officer was a man of magnetic personality, and before her work was fully accomplished this woman realized that she was in love with him. Matters had gone quite far. Already the principal part of the desired information was in the hands of the foreign envoys. They were speeding in a launch to a vessel lying in the harbor. This vessel belonged to the nation they represented. As the female spy watched them through a field glass she began to have regrets, and to think of the consequences her actions would bring upon the man she loved. She looked at the mine chart before her. By pressing a button she could undo in an instant all the damage she had done. Acting upon this impulse she pushed the button and there was a great explosion. The foreign envoys and their vessel went to the bottom, while she remained to marry the man she loved.

Doings at Los Angeles

Interesting Information Concerning Producers and Players on the Pacific Coast.

AN interesting situation which is now developing will be presented to motion picture fans within the next two months when two of the big manufacturers will release, at about the same time, big special productions of the same subject.

The Biograph Company and the Bison Company have just produced pictures dealing with the Custer massacre and the events leading up to it. The Bison's production will be another big three-reel effort of the kind which is rapidly making that company's lasting fame. The Biograph's production of the same subject will make two reels, according to report.

An interesting fact is that both pictures were made within ten or fifteen miles of each other and both were finished on the same day and the negatives were probably carried East on the same train.

The Biograph's picture was produced at San Fernando, a small town located in the foothills about fifteen or twenty miles from Los Angeles. The secrecy which usually surrounds the making of Biograph pictures was in this case broken down by the magnitude of the production. On the day Director D. W. Griffith staged his biggest scene depicting the raid of Custer's men on the Indian village and the slaughter of the women and children of the tribes, practically all business was suspended in the little town of San Fernando, two miles away, and the population moved out and swarmed over the nearby hills whence an excellent view of the show was to be obtained. Even the local school was dismissed, so that the children could join the exodus.

The Bison picture, produced by Director Ince, was made in Santa Monica canyon. In many respects it is the best thing this company has put out. Back of it are months of preparation and careful study of the many historical accounts of the great battle. The photoplay, which was written by Scenario Editor Spencer, of the company, follows the historical facts with the utmost accuracy possible. It is worth noticing that genuine Indians were used in the pictures and three of them were actually present when Custer lost his life. They were boys who followed the warriors and looted the dead. About 300 cavalrymen and twice as many Indians took part in the Bison production, and the Biograph company for the special occasion was almost as large. Griffith and his men spent an entire week at San Fernando, living during that time in a city of tents which was built outside the borders of the town.

The Bison Company has just finished moving its offices in Edendale. The move was not a long one—merely from one side of the street to the other—but it made all the difference in the world to the office force, for the new quarters give plenty of room, and light, and air. The vacated building is being torn to pieces and remodeled into dark rooms which, when equipped with additional drums and tanks, will more than double the present equipment.

For the present, following the release of the coming Custer three-reel picture, the company will go back to releasing four one-reel subjects every week. Two-reel productions will be resumed a little later when there will be two of them released monthly.

Biograph Company Goes East.

The big event of the week among the producing companies was the departure of the Biograph company the night of May 27. The Biograph players have been working here all winter and now go to New York for the summer. The two directors, Griffith, who has charge of the dramatic releases, and Mack Sennet, who directs the comedies, are to stop over for a few days at Albuquerque, N. M., where a couple of pictures are to be made. Griffith has been getting ready for some time to put on a historical picture which needs Albuquerque as a background, but just what it is about will have to await the pleasure of the Biograph Company for announcement. Only a part of the company will stop over in New Mexico. The others will go direct to New York. The summer work in the new Eastern studio which has just been completed is scheduled to start June 5.

The departure of the Biograph company has deprived Los Angeles and motion picture circles of a unique organization—the Biograph Grouch Club. The founder and president is L. E. Dougherty, scenario editor for the company. Miss Mary Pickford is president of the women's auxiliary. It was started about the first of the year and only persons on the Biograph payroll were eligible—otherwise the membership would have become unwieldy. As the name indicates, the loss of one's poise, otherwise known as losing one's goat, made one a member. Mack Sennet, the comedy director, held out bravely, but the rush of finishing the last picture before the plant was turned over to the caretaker was too much for him. His initiation made it unanimous. The emblem of the organization is a black pansy, pansies being for thoughts and the black pansy for black thoughts. An official flag has also been adopted. This consists of a buzzard on a yellow background attacking the dove of peace. At the meeting at which this was adopted there was a fight made on the yellow background, the argument advanced against it being that yellow symbolizes sunshine, a cheerful symbol. The advocates finally won with the contention that since the buzzard is represented as blotting out the sunshine it should be allowed to stand.

New Scale for Photoplaywrights.

W. H. Clifford, president of the Pacific Motion Picture Company of this city, comes to the front this week with a new policy that promises to revolutionize the photoplay-writing business. In an authorized announcement he says: "Hereafter this company will give credit to the author of a photoplay on every reel it produces. This is not new. Other companies are doing it and we are following suit only because that is the fair and right thing to do. The new feature is that we will abandon the practice of paying a flat price for photoplays. In future the author will be paid $5 for every print of his photoplay sent out. If we make 100 prints of a film the author will receive $500, and his royalties will continue as long as there is a demand for his work. I think that will be an incentive to the writers to produce big subjects. My idea is to get the best men and women in the business working for the Pacific company. More than that, I want to interest successful writers like Richard Harding Davis, Rex Beach and people of that sort in this new and coming field of art. The top-notchers haven't cared to bother with photoplay writing heretofore because the returns have not justified the effort, but I believe that a royalty of $5 a print will make it worth while for any of them to get down to studying the technique of this new art."

The policy goes into effect at once and Mr. Clifford invites authors to submit scripts. The address of the company is 1614 Temple Street, Los Angeles.

"Halimar," a big sensational special feature, is about to be put out by the Pacific Motion Picture Company. The central idea embodied in the picture is a unique and bold one to say the least. W. H. Clifford, president of the company, who wrote the story and has just obtained copyright on it, describes the central feature of the film in the following account: "A photograph of the eyes of a celebrated Hindoo hypnotist that will put under the hypnotic spell all in the audience who are susceptible to hypnotic suggestion, although the owner is thousands of miles away in his native India."

Clifford says he has tried it out on a number of subjects at private views of the picture and that it works. For this reason he thinks it will prove a sensation when it is given to the public. The reels are to be marketed on the State rights plan.

The hypnotist's eyes, of course, are only a detail of the picture. There is a story of mystery and intrigue connected with it and a love theme running through it. The scenes are laid in India and a great many of the performers in the picture are natives of India. All the pictures are hand-colored.

The members of the Pathe Western company in search of "local color" and "atmosphere" for a Spanish romantic picture, this week invaded Sonoratown, headed by James Youngdeer, director of the company. Sonoratown is the old pueblo name for the picturesque Mexican quarter of Los Angeles. With its low adobe buildings, its narrow streets and its quaint people, it resembles more a section of the city of Mexico than a part of a modern American city. For some reason tourists seldom find it out and, what is more strange, the Pathe people seem to have been the first motion picture company to discover it.

The public committee which is making the arrangements for the convention of the National Municipal League, which is to be held here the week of July 8, has announced that public exhibitions of motion pictures will be one of the features of the National Civic Exhibit to be held in conjunction with the convention. The films will show glimpses of cities of this and foreign countries with special reference to the handling of municipal problems. The convention will attract city officials, engineers, architects, experts on all phases of city life, and students of municipal problems.

About the Players.

Fred Mace, one of the principal comedians with the Biograph company, did not accompany the other members when they left for New York this week. Instead, on the same day the company left, he opened an engagement with the Imp forces, where he will play comedy leads.

Terrell B. Ross, who was recently elected treasurer of the Pacific Motion Picture Company, is preparing to go to Europe this summer in the interests of his company.

Alvin Wyckoff, formerly cameraman with the Selig Polyscope Company, who left some time ago and joined the Imp forces, is again back in the Selig studio.

Fred Montgomery, formerly producer for the Selig Company, has resigned. A new producer named Garrick has been sent for and is coming to Los Angeles from the Chicago studio.

Charles Klopot, of Chicago, is in Los Angeles with two copies of the Eclair three-reel production of the French detective story, "Zigomar." Since he has been here the reels have been shown in six theaters and in every case they seem to have increased business.

The Angelus Picture Company, a strictly local concern, has been reorganized and will hereafter be known as the Los Angeles Motion Picture Company. Theodore Newman is the head of the concern, and the studio is located at 137 East Avenue 49. At present the company is doing nothing but commercial work.

W. T. Horne, owner of one of the principal downtown picture theaters, is making preparations to attend the forthcoming meeting of the executive committee of the Grand Lodge of the T. M. A. He is Grand Vice-President of the organization.

Globe Amusement Company Enterprise.

The Globe Amusement Company, a $1,000,000 corporation recently organized in this city to operate a chain of picture theaters, has just closed a deal which will give it another house, the fifth of a string which will ultimately number fifteen.

H. W. Nixon, general manager of the company, has just closed a contract with L. F. Spaulding, real estate owner and builder, to erect a $75,000 theater, with a seating capacity of 1,000, at 18th and Main Streets.

The company is now operating the Globe Theater No. 1 at Fifth and Los Angeles Streets, but this is to be torn down this summer to make way for a ten-story office building with a theater holding 1,400 on the ground floor.

Globe Theater No. 2, at Central Avenue and Jefferson Street, is nearing completion. The contract calls for a $30,000 building to hold 750.

Globe Theater No. 3 is also under construction. It is at Sunset Boulevard and Echo Park Avenue. The cost will be $35,000 and the seating capacity will be 800.

Globe Theater No. 4 is located at Pablos Verde and Sixth Streets in San Pedro, the harbor section of this city. It is now being erected under contract with Luke Kelly, owner of the site. It will cost $65,000 and will hold 700.

Locations for the ten other houses in or near Los Angeles have been tentatively selected and announcements will be made as the contracts are perfected. It is expected to have all the houses either in operation or under construction before October 1.

CINES AND ECLIPSE RELEASES FOR WEEK OF JUNE 15th.

George Kleine's Cines players were shown in the release of Tuesday, June 11th, in a very unusual war drama called "A Soldier's Heart," which is based on what is said to be a true incident of the Italian-Turkish War. It is a photoplay with a keen human heart interest involving a little Arab girl whose parents fell in their attack by the Italian Army on their little village in Tripoli, and a young Italian soldier of such tender heart that he cannot see the child, bereaved of her parents, suffer, and who, in order to protect and care for the little waif, risks the displeasure of his colonel and violates army regulations. She soon becomes the pet of the regiment and the idol of all the soldiers. To tell too much would detract pleasure from the picture and it had best be seen to be fully appreciated.

A short scenic was added to complete the reel and the subject chosen is very appropriate, as it describes scenes in Italy of "Messina As It Is To-day." Everyone will recall the terrible catastrophe that occurred when that picturesque city was destroyed. It is a remarkable series of scenes.

The Wednesday, June 12th, Eclipse was a three-subject reel containing a capital farce-comedy full of highly amusing accidents which should evoke many laughs. "Percy's First Camera" is the title and that in itself suggested the possibilities for amusing entertainment which an awkward amateur might create in snapping views and developing his plates. Percy, especially, is particularly unfortunate, and to crown a day fraught with mishaps and misadventures he becomes careless with his lighted cigarette while in the dark-room, and we will let the picture tell the rest of the story. On the same reel was an industrial subject which shows the process of "Making Silk Hats," an instructive as well as interesting film; taking us through one of the leading manufactories of London, England, and showing the various operations from raw product to the beautiful, finished silk beavers as turned out with the utmost care by expert workmen. To complete the reel a short scenic was added showing views "Through Saskatchewan" on the Canadian Northern Railway. This beautiful and fertile valley in the southwestern part of Canada is one of the most wonderful grain-producing sections on this continent, if not the world.

The Saturday Cines, June 15th, contained two subjects on the reel, a rippling comedy and a beautifully colored scenic. "Leah, the Telephone Girl," shows this popular Cines comedienne in a new role as a switchboard operator, where she succeeds by her laxity in so enraging the colonel that he secures her discharge, and then has a change of heart on seeing the charming young lady and how dejectedly she receives the news, and, as a result, a little romance is begun which ends—as you will best see in the picture itself. The scenic, "Venice, Italy," completes the reel and shows with beautifully colored views the interesting sights on the Lagoons, Grand Canal, the many historic bridges, St. Mark's Square and a number of palaces, street scenes and natives.

"THE THANHOUSER TWINS."

We have had "The Thanhouser Kid," "The Thanhouser Kidlet," and, lately, "The Thanhouser Poodle," but all this array must stand back for that which has just double the strength (numerically) of any of 'em—to wit, "The Thanhouser Twins." They make their first appearance in a film released Tuesday, June 18th, that is called "The Twins." The twins, of course, are the hit of "The Twins." Likewise "The Twins" would be naught without the twins. As it is, "The Twins" is a success and the twins are a success.

Scene from "The Twins," Thanhouser.

The story relates that a grouchy old uncle adopts one of the twins, when they become orphans—declining to have the other, who forthwith is sent to an orphanage. But the orphanage twin escapes from there and joins her sister at the uncle's. Here, through consummate cleverness and their remarkable resemblance to each other, they fool the uncle into thinking that just one sister is in the house.

IMP PICTURES A CHARLES READE STORY.

The announcement that the Imp Films Company is to follow up the highly successful two-reel picture, "Lady Audley's Secret," with another two-reel photoplay of a similar nature will not cause surprise. "Lady Audley's Secret" is one of the most successful and best acted pictures seen in an American moving picture theater.

Jane Fernley, King Baggot, William E. Shay, to say nothing of W. R. Daly, scored the successes of their moving picture careers, so far, in "Lady Audley's Secret."

The successor of "Lady Audley's Secret" chosen by the company is "It Is Never Too Late to Mend," which is slated for release in the near future.

"It Is Never Too Late To Mend" is a magnificent Anglo-Australian novel written by the late Charles Reade, one of the most renowned and powerful English novelists of the last century. It deals with life and adventure in Australia and in England and is as full of intense thrills as "Lady Audley's Secret."

The Independent Situation

Fierce Fight on Between the Two Factions—Status of Eclair in Doubt—A Third Combination Organizing.

THE condition of the independent motion picture manufacturers becomes more and more precarious as the fight between the Universal and Film Supply companies progresses. Both factions seem determined upon a fight to a finish with no favors, and, while those interests are battling for supremacy, new picture manufacturing companies are springing up like mushrooms in the night with the purpose of getting a foothold while the others are quarreling.

The Moving Picture World is informed that there is under way a well-defined third independent combination of some seven or more companies, all well organized and equipped, with pictures ready to release. The promoters have kept their plans well under cover, but will make an announcement very soon. This new element will tend to further complicate matters in the independent field.

Principal interest in the contest between the Universal Company and the Film Supply Company centers about the Eclair Company. When the Film Supply Company first announced its program the product of the Eclair was included, and the statement was freely made that President Joujoun, of that concern, was an advocate of the principles of the Film Supply. But when the Universal Company came forward with an offer for the Eclair plant which, in cash and securities approximated half a million dollars, Mr. Joujoun felt obliged to place the matter before his board of directors in Paris and took the transatlantic ferry last Wednesday for that city. Until he is heard from, the exact status of Eclair will not be known. At present its product is being announced as Sales Company releases, and the Film Supply Company has taken the Eclair from its announcements, which may be construed as a concession in favor of the Universal Company.

The Film Supply Company announces the organization of a new company to be known as the "All Star." This company, it is explained, will be composed of the best available talent, from camera men to players. Efforts will be made to enlist theatrical players of prominence and the most efficient directors. It will be patterned somewhat along the lines of the famous Society Film d'Art, of Paris. This company will be under the immediate direction of the Film Supply Co.

The Thanhouser Company announces that it will have a third weekly release to begin Sunday, June 23rd. Other companies affiliated with the Film Supply will increase their product.

One of the amusing features of the fight is the peculiar position of Harry Raver, who is wondering just where he is at. To begin with, he is vice-president and a director of the Sales Company; he is general manager of the Eclair Company and in charge of its affairs during the absence of President Joujoun, and, lastly, he is secretary of the Film Supply Company and probably the general manager of that concern.

There are many changes being made as a result of the split in the independent ranks and every day brings about changes in the status of trusted employes. It will be some time before business gets down to normal.

"THE GLASS COFFIN."

This wonderful three-reel subject comprises a modern novel of love and violence. It is a feature that appeals to the masses. The state rights for this picture are being handled by the Warner Feature Film Co., are selling fast and Mr. Warner reports the latest sale of "The Glass Coffin" to Mr. Lew Fisher, of the Media Theater, Catskill, N. Y., for the state of New York.

"HER VENGEANCE" (Cines).

A powerful drama to be released by George Kleine, June 22d. The story depicts with vivid reality, the truth that tenderest love abused, often gives way to the most cruel revenge.

A young couple are living happily together, when a sudden advent of prosperity causes the husband to develop a taste for leading the gay life. This does not appeal to his more sensible wife, who sees the folly and ultimate dangers of it. She is devoted to her husband, and tries her best to keep him in the straight and narrow path, but with little success.

One day, when they are out for a pleasure ride, the wife becomes ill, and is forced to rest in a lonely shed. Here the treacherous husband sees an opportunity to accomplish his wicked purpose; he sets fire to the shack and hastens away. Soon afterwards the wife awakes, and realizes her perilous situation. Rising to her feet she staggers about in a fit of terror, attempting to dodge the leaping flames. Finally she manages to make her way through the burning door to safety, but her mind has become unhinged.

A few months later, after partial recovery, her mind reverts to her past experience. She broods; she ponders; she stares, as if the power of some terrible thought were fastening upon her, and then leaps forward with an air of satisfaction. Her life has now an all absorbing motive; she must find her husband.

A long search brings her to his residence just in time to see him preparing to take his fiancee out riding. At the sight of his wife's approach, he attempts safety in flight, but he reckons not with whom he deals, for, quickly mounting the other horse, she desperately gives chase, and after a perilous ride, succeeds in bringing him to bay at the edge of a steep precipice. After a short struggle, she hurls him over the brink to his death.

The burning of the dwelling is a hair-raising scene, and the wild pursuit on horseback is almost beyond description; it will not soon be forgotten.

"THE HEROIC GIRL FROM DERNA"

Is the name of a forthcoming Italian masterpiece in two reels, soon to be released by the International Film Traders.

This picture portrays a real incident in the late war with Tripoli. A captain in the Italian army, while protecting a young Arabian girl from the insults offered her by the Turks, is severely wounded and taken a prisoner. After hearing of his capture, the captain's wife is suddenly taken ill, and confined to her bed, and it is left to the daughter to devise some scheme to secure her father's release.

Scene from "The Heroic Girl from Derna."

The scenes leading up to, and following the capture and escape enclose many intensely dramatic situations. The subject through its entirety is full of action, is well staged, acted and photographed.

BIOGRAPH PLAYERS RETURN.

Director Griffith and his company of Biograph players have returned from Los Angeles, Cal., and will shortly resume work at the new Biograph studio in the Bronx.

MISS ALICE JOYCE BACK IN NEW YORK.

Miss Alice Joyce, the leading favorite with the California Kalem company of players for the past three years, has returned to New York and will appear in the Kalem comedy company under the direction of Mr. Lawrence.

"Lincoln's Gettysburg Address"

A Vitagraph One-Reel Feature for Independence Day that Will Have a Perennial Value.

WHAT so rare as a reliable historical moving picture? On a certain day in this month of June, the Vitagraph Company exhibited in private its Fourth of July release. It comes somewhere near being an historical picture. It agrees with what boys and girls are taught at school. It does not insult anyone's intelligence by dragging in some fictitious love affair, commonly known as "heart interest." The great trouble with almost every historical moving picture that has been made is, that the manufacturer or producer would persist in introducing an entirely foreign love episode, that never had anything whatever to do with any part of American history.

Since the schools have begun to recognize the moving picture as a beneficial institution, the exhibitor has been more keen than ever to book reliable historical pictures, or at least those that will not give the school children a wrong idea of American history. The progressive picture theater manager we know will hail with delight this latest Vitagraph feature, which is one of the best Fourth of July offerings that has been made for a long time.

As a first assurance of success they left out the fictitious love story. They then proceeded to illustrate, step by step, that famous oration made by Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg on November 19, 1863. By Lincoln, the battlefield was dedicated as a national cemetery. His memorial speech on that occasion has come to be recognized as one of the classics of the English language. In the compass of a couple of hundred well chosen words, Lincoln embodied a composition that is remarkable for the great volume of thought which it contains. Each sentence of his address sums up a gigantic undertaking of days gone by or days to come. Each sentence contains a story, with great picture possibilities therein. The Vitagraph Company has simply taken this address and illustrated it, sentence by sentence, in such a capable manner as to class the entire picture as one of the finest war subjects that has ever been produced by a motion picture company. As an undertaking the picture represents great expense, study and patriotic sentiment. The expense of staging the battle scenes was enormous, to say nothing of the labor and patience involved in maneuvering hundreds of troops in such realistic sham battles. A sham battle in the open, from a military point of view, is one thing, and the feat of getting it within range of a motion picture camera is still another thing, more difficult than the former.

The picture begins with the sub-title repeating the first sentence of the Gettysburg address: "Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation." In those words there lies a wealth of picture material. It covers the entire Revolutionary War. Conforming to this, the first scene represents the siege of Yorktown and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to General Washington, and other Revolutionary incidents, such as the famous trio of fifer, drummer and flag-bearer, who represent so well the spirit of '76. The second phrase of the first sentence of Lincoln's address goes on as follows: "Conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." This phrase, as a sub-title, opens to our vision the story of the Liberty Bell, ringing out its message of freedom to mankind, which falls as music upon the ears of the assembled multitude outside of the State House at Philadelphia. A scene well done and entirely fraught with meaning to every American citizen. The second sentence of Lincoln's address begins, "Now we are engaged in a great Civil War." Another vista of the greatest magnitude opens its broad expanse with those words. It involves the great Civil War with its momentous times and consequences, among which the Battle of Gettysburg was only one of many bloody conflicts. The sentence goes on to say: "Testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and dedicated can long endure." This brings us to the meditations of those wise and loyal men who were at that time in charge of the nation's affairs, and who brought their country through the crisis with such nobility and sacrifice. Lincoln's Cabinet is shown, to illustrate the labors and anxieties of that faithful body of men. And so on through the famous address the scenes alluded to are one by one taken up and shown in the fullest of detail.

Ralph Ince as Lincoln is, of course, the central figure of the picture. His well-known characterization of Abraham

A Meeting of Lincoln's Cabinet—Scene from the Vitagraph Patriotic Feature, "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address."

Lincoln is conceded to be one of the best historical make-ups that has ever been seen in moving pictures or elsewhere. Mr. Ince has made a special study of Lincoln. In his portrayal of that character, he has gone far beneath the surface or exterior appearance. He has studied Lincoln's moods and manners and gestures. He has exhausted many volumes to perfect the personal characteristics of the martyred President. On a number of other occasions he has appeared in the character of Lincoln, and no one who has seen him play the part will ever forget it.

Slaveship Scene from "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address."

This picture of "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address" was conceived by that splendid actor, Mr. James Young. The idea and the inspiration were his, and for that he deserves much credit. He also had a considerable part in the making of the production, although no one man deserves the credit for the entire production. Mr. J. Stuart Blackton is the man who really put through the finer points of photographic work and studio ensembles, including some double and triple exposure work that reveals the hand of a wizard. Mr. Young, having been a military man, had much to do with the battle scenes, while they were being taken. These battle scenes are the kind that start the blood in one's veins. There is one of them where the artillery is firing from the edge of a plateau that is a little masterpiece of composition. It reminds one of those exquisite groupings of Edouard D'Etaile or Meissonier.

"Lincoln's Gettysburg Address" is not a mere transitory Fourth of July release; it is one of those efforts that will last, like a well written book. It can be used on every patriotic holiday throughout the year, and no one would become weary of looking at it. It is a great undertaking, well done, and it is a pleasure to recommend it, not only to moving picture men, but to everybody. Release date, July 3. H. F. H.

HISTORIC GROUND FOR PICTURES.

American Company Stages the "Black Hawk" Production in Region Where the Disturbance Occurred.

The monster two-reel historical production, "The Fall of Black Hawk," which the American Film Mfg. Co. is soon to release, had an odd feature connected with the rehearsal of one of the scenes. The particular scene in question was the army encampment of General Winfield Scott. The soldiers are shown sick of fevers and cholera, and, while attending to the invalids, the historical meeting between Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis takes place. This is an historical fact, and was actually the first time these two great American leaders saw each other.

It developed during the rehearsal of the scene that the sickness of the soldiers occurred on that exact spot which then constituted the old Illinois trail, over which General Scott marched his troops into Wisconsin in 1830. The information, while of little consequence to the public because not known, had much to do in allowing the producer an exceptionally fine bit of acting through the enthusiasm of the players.

"The Fall of Black Hawk" occurred in 1832. He surrendered to Colonel Zachary Taylor, after a fierce guerilla warfare extending over a period of two years. In presenting this great subject the American Film Mfg. Co. has adhered to the best reference books for historical data of those strenuous times.

Not only do the great personalities of Abraham Lincoln, Jefferson Davis, Zachary Taylor and General Winfield Scott stand out as great features to advertise, but the picture also has been prepared with an eye to portraying some of those spectacular bits of work which go to make a film memorable.

There is the signing of the treaty of July 15, 1830, by which the Fox and Sac tribes relinquished all claim to lands east of the Mississippi. There follows the scenes of the white settlers arriving north of the Rock River, their quarrels with the Indians and Black Hawk's decision to fight. Then comes the enlistment of troops, in which Harry Launsdale, that famous impersonator of Lincoln, gathers together a handful of men and joins Scott's command.

What follows shows the days of suffering in the long march to Fort Crawford, Wis., and it is during this journey that Lincoln gains his first fame as a wrestler.

Black Hawk, hearing that Scott is on his way, decides to surrender, and many old Wisconsin settlers repeat the incident their fathers recited of how Black Hawk, after sending his four Indians with a peace message to Scott, waged unrelenting war when he heard that his four Indians had been ruthlessly shot down by drunken rangers.

Those historic scenes around Fort Crawford are reproduced as accurately as possible. The St. Louis home of Col. Zachary Taylor and his two daughters and their sudden decision to go through the Indian infested country to their father, are made a part of this subject. The capture of Sarah Taylor by the Indians, her thrilling rescue by Jefferson Davis, and the exploit of her sister, Elizabeth, who does a most remarkable lassoing feat from the limb of a tree in a critical moment, when death faces her sister, are all "thrillers" that will set the blood on fire with excitement.

The official release date will be announced in the immediate future.

"The Return of William Marr" (Essanay).

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

ESSANAY'S Eastern company has produced a film of more than ordinary merit in "The Return of William Marr." The story is not new, but it has been treated in a manner that engages interest and holds it throughout.

The acting of the principal characters by Miss Martha Russell, Frank Dayton and Francis X. Bushman is commendable. Miss Russell especially shows a careful study and sure grasp of the role assigned her—that of the estimable wife, whose first husband is a worthless drunkard, and who marries a second, believing that the first has been killed in a railroad accident. Miss Russell does more than act the part when the first husband comes again into her life, after years have elapsed, and she is living happily with the second husband, who adores her. The shock brings with it an agony of speechless horror that is not only seen but felt by the spectator, so realistically does Miss Russell live the scene. Then her tearful and frenzied begging, that this ghost of a man shall spare her and the man she loves by going out again into the shadows, touches the depths of despair. Indeed, it may well be said that the work of Miss Russell lifts this production from what might otherwise have been commonplace.

Scene from "The Return of William Marr" (Essanay).

The scenes at the close, showing the accidental shooting of the first husband, is clumsy work and not at all convincing. It is apparent to all that the bullet never could have struck him, judging from the direction in which he held the pistol.

William Marr is a slave of strong drink. The opening scene reveals him quarreling with his wife because she refuses to furnish means to continue his debauch. He leaves the house in a rage, determined to satisfy his craving. At a corner he spies a man, poorly clad, drinking whiskey from a small bottle. Marr approaches and asks to be treated. The shabbily dressed stranger looks at him and refuses. Marr again asks, but the tramp points to the difference in their apparel—that of Marr being neat and respectable—and bargains to give the remainder of his liquor if Marr will exchange clothes with him. This is done, and we see Marr, in tramp's garb, draining the contents of the bottle, while the tramp, outwardly respectable, marches off whistling.

Next morning the newspapers announced the death of one William Marr, whose mangled body had been found on a railroad track. Cards in the pockets revealed the identity of the body. The tramp had come to his end while riding a brakebeam, in his new clothing, while the real William Marr still lived.

The wife of the supposed dead man read the item and so did William Marr. He resolved to take advantage of the accident and escape the burden of a wife and her sermonizing; she was horrified at her husband's untimely end.

Seven years elapse and we find Mrs. Marr in a beautiful home, where she has lived happily since her remarriage. Her home life is ideal and seems to have come by way of compensation for the anguish and heartbreakings of her first marriage. But the glad sunshine is soon to be obscured for a time. One day when the former Mrs. Marr and her second husband alight from a carriage in front of their home, a tramp chances to pass. He glances at the woman's face and immediately recognizes her. The tramp is William Marr.

He keeps close watch on the house, until the man who accompanied his wife goes out. Then he stealthily gains entrance and comes on the happy little woman in the sitting room. The terror and shock of the meeting numbs both the heart and brain of the woman, who sees her happiness wrecked. She pleads on her knees that he shall go away and never return. Marr demands money. Hastily she gives him all that she can spare and he departs.

Scene from "The Return of William Marr" (Essanay).

But William Marr returns a few days afterwards. He wants more money. She had given her second husband all that remained of the amount in her possession that very morning, and shows Marr the empty drawer where it had been left. With a curse he seizes the necklace she wears and wrenches it off. As he examines the jewels she opens a drawer and seizes a revolver. He is still absorbed in estimating the value of the necklace when she commands him to give it up. He starts in surprise and looks into the muzzle of the pistol.

But Marr does not believe that his wife will shoot, and by a ruse disarms her. As he sits twirling the weapon in his fingers and mocking the misery of the little woman, the pistol is discharged and he falls dead.

Husband Number Two and a police officer happen to be engaged in conversation in front of the residence and hear the report. They rush in and find Marr dead and the pistol in the hand of Mrs. Marr, who had taken it from the fingers of the dead man. The officer believes her guilty, but she points to the necklace still in the death grip of William Marr.

PICTURE PEOPLE MARRY.

Mr. Clement Rizzo, a well-known operator of Philadelphia, and at present in charge of the projection at the Inferno Theater, on the Boardwalk, in Atlantic City, and Miss Elizabeth Florence Holgate, also of Philadelphia, were married recently in Atlantic City. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. S. G. Pitt at the residence of the pastor on South Maryland Avenue, Atlantic City. The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Rizzo join in wishing them a happiness and all the joy of married life.

SELIG COMPANY PLAN BIG PICTURES.

The Selig Polyscope Company has been busily engaged recently in the production of several elaborate single reel war pictures. Famous incidents during the Spanish-American War have been produced with realistic fidelity in the present series. The battle of San Juan will be among the first released.

"Called Back"

A Thanhouser Adaptation of the Most Popular Novel of a Past Decade—A Fine Two-Reel Dramatic Feature.

CONTINUING on its way in the interpretation of the world's best literature, through the medium of the moving picture, the Thanhouser Company is showing evidences of great improvement. The work of this company is beginning to show signs of bigness. Something of the master hand is clearly discernible to the critic. One of the cardinal points of a photoplay is, of course, the story, but ofttimes the story is neglected for some other branch of the picture maker's craft. The Thanhouser pictures, first of all, tell the story. Not with subtitles, but with the characters themselves. That point stands forth particularly clear in "Called Back," the latest two-reel Thanhouser production. The picture tells its own story in an unbroken line of interest. There is not a single extraneous incident in any part of it, and it bears right down to the nub from the very beginning.

"Called Back" is a pictured version of the novel of that name by Hugh Conway, which had enjoyed a great vogue of popularity about fifteen years ago. At that time everybody was reading it, and the work was a topic of conversation wherever people gathered socially. As a work of fiction it has endured long enough to put it in a class of books that will always be popular. One of the main reasons for that is because the story is a story of action. On that account it lends itself to moving picture adaptation unusually well. Apart from the story itself the scenic selections show taste of a very high order. Many a poor story has been helped out by an exquisite background; there are also some stories that have sufficient force to carry them over regardless of the setting, but in this Thanhouser picture there is combined a strength of story with an equally compelling choice of landscape, and the result is manifest in interest and charm. All this apart from the good acting and the really high-class photography. While no attempts have been made at fancy lighting effects, the light is finely distributed in all the scenes; the characters stand out well modeled and unusually stereoscopic. There is much quality in this respect, and it is quite certain that someone at the Thanhouser studio understands lighting down to the minutest fraction of a second, which, after all, is the principal trick of photography.

All the contributory elements mentioned above cannot help but make a good picture. Then there is the acting. Much praise is due to the skilful rendition of the blind youth by Mr. James Cruze. One of the difficulties of portraying the part of a blind person is to keep the eyelids from winking. There were long stretches where this capable actor had the critic on pins and needles, wondering how long he could keep it up, much in the same way that we often get nervous wondering how long a swimmer can hold his breath under water.

The story is one that has provoked many arguments, pro and con, as to what a blind man would be apt to do under certain conditions. The principal character is Gilbert Vaughn, a wealthy young man who was suddenly stricken blind at his studies one night. The young man in time became more or less resigned to his fate, although hope was extended to him by the physicians who had reason to believe that they could cure him. While blind, young Vaughn developed some of the faculties which blind men find useful. His sense of hearing became sharpened and he got about readily by the use of a cane, as blind men do. He did not go far from his home at any time, and was always in the company of his sister or mother. But one night he slipped out of the house unnoticed, to take a stroll before going to bed. In returning, however, he became confused and got into the wrong house by mistake. In a city like London, there are many houses exactly alike, being built in rows. There is many a man not blind who occasionally gets into another man's dwelling because it resembles his own. This proceeding on the part of young Vaughn therefore was not anything remarkable. Inside the hallway Vaughn realized that something had gone amiss. He heard a woman's voice singing by a piano. Also voices of men in conversation. As with blind men, the sound of music pleased his ear, and he paused to listen to the sweet voice. He heard the men talking louder and louder. He heard them wrangle until the argument terminated in a gasp, and the fall of a body. The piano playing ceased immediately, and Vaughn, thinking that perhaps the singer had met with an accident, felt his way into the room where the girl lay weeping over the body of her brother, who had been stabbed by one of his companions.

The men were all thieves and the girl was the niece of one of them, though not herself a criminal. The shock of witnessing her brother's murder unbalanced the mind of this girl. Meanwhile, Vaughn has been seized by the desperate characters in the room, and would have fared badly had he not declared his blindness and made known his mistake in entering the house. In order to make sure that he would not remember the house that he had entered, one of the men led Vaughn around through devious streets, and left him lost on a corner.

Some time elapsed. Vaughn's sight was restored by skillful surgery, and shortly afterward he started on a journey to Italy. While in Italy he happened into a Cathedral and there, at her devotions, he observed a beautiful young woman. She was the woman he heard singing on the night of the murder in the strange house, although, of course, he had no idea at the time who she was. Vaughn became smitten with the charms of this strange young lady, but he found it difficult to communicate with her, as she was always in charge of an older woman. He determined, nevertheless, that he would make her acquaintance. He followed them to a building which proved to be a boarding house. When they had entered he rang the bell, engaged a room for himself, and went there to live. In the natural course of events, he became acquainted with the family upstairs, and found that the young woman was under the guardianship of an uncle. This uncle was one of the crooks who was present on the night of the murder in the London house. Vaughn did not know that this young lady was not in her right mind. When he approached the girl's guardian and announced that he would like to marry the girl, the uncle was very anxious that they should marry at once; but insisted upon proof that the young man had means.

The wedding ceremony was performed without any delay, although the bride scarcely realized what she was doing. Her uncle disappeared soon after, and in a few days Vaughn realized that his wife was an insane person. With her he returned to England and they got on very nicely. Vaughn became acquainted with a young man who seemed to take a great fancy to him, and Vaughn on his part seemed to think well of his new acquaintance. This man, however, was the real slayer of the mad girl's brother. His object in making the acquaintance of Vaughn was, perhaps, to find out the state of the young woman's mind in regard to the murder some years ago. She was the only one who could point the finger of accusation at him, and no doubt for that reason he wished to be informed of her state of mind. As long as she remained insane she was not dangerous to him. In hovering about, however, the murderer was making a great mistake. One night when he came face to face with Vaughn's wife, she screamed as she recognized him, and her memory came back like a flood tide. All the terrible events of that fatal night were brought back by the sight of the murderer standing before her. That, of course, was his undoing. With the restoration of her memory she recognized in Vaughn the blind man whom she saw that night. She was somewhat surprised to find that she was now his wife, but her satisfaction was manifested quite soon.

In the form of a moving picture it is an intense drama, and one that every exhibitor will want to exhibit. It is a feature that can be advertised heavily with the safe assurance that it will make good. H. F. H.

A TWO-REEL THANHOUSER EVERY WEEK.

Thanhouser Company, pioneers in the production of feature subjects, announce a startling step in this field. According to a statement just received from them, they will release a two-reel feature film every week. The New Rochelle concern was about the first to specialize in "classics" and other subjects of the feature order, and of late have undertaken the regular monthly issuance of such films. They are the very first manufacturer to announce a two-reel picture weekly. This release will be in addition to a regular weekly single-reel. The Thanhouser release days will remain as present: Tuesday and Friday.

To cope with the new feature-a-week order of things, many enlargements have been made at the Thanhouser plant, the most important being in the factory, where new developing and dark rooms have been added.

MORE SELIG ANIMALS SHIPPED WEST.

Last Thursday the Selig Polyscope Company shipped another seventy-foot car of wild animals to its Los Angeles farm. The car consisted of camels, bears, lions, yaks, zebras, and Eskimo dogs. Mr. Rex de Rosselli and two caretakers accompanied the car to the Los Angeles farm. Big preparations are under way in the Selig Western branch for the staging of several two and three reel jungle pictures.

As to the Aladdin.

HERE is a little letter with a moral. Lee D. Balsky, of the Aladdin Theater, Springfield, Mo., sends this:

> A few weeks ago I sent you a picture of the Aladdin, thinking perhaps you would or could use it in the World, but have not heard of nor seen the picture. Kindly advise as to the disposition of the picture. I find much good advice in your department and I am enclosing a bill I got out during the Elks' Convention in this city, May 15th. To say the least, I did a capacity business. The Pathe, "That Houn' Dawg," was a winner, as it filled the bill and permitted the pianist to make good use of the music of the song, while the picture was really good comedy.

There are two reasons why the picture of the Aladdin went into obscurity. The most important of these is that the management very thoughtfully refrained from indicating the location of the house. We admit we are clever, but with some ten thousand houses in the United States, we cannot keep track of them all, and know, without being told, that this particular Aladdin Theater was in Springfield. The second was that the picture was a straight picture of the house front and these should be sent the editor direct and not to this department. We are interested only when the photograph has to deal with some special advertising display. In any case, tell where your house is. Do not simply send in a postcard print and expect us to know the rest. It can't be done without a make-up. Tell us all you know.

As to the Circular.

The circular is a simple sheet, well worded and illustrated with a cut of the dog known in the A. T. F. catalogue as a Chap Book Cut. We have seen it used in several "Houn' Dawg" circulars and folders, and it might have been made especially for this Pathe release. If you are close to a branch of the American Type Founders and your printer has one of the style books, you will find scores of cuts that will come in handy. If your printer will not stock them for you buy them yourself and loan them to the printer as they are needed, making certain that they come back to you as soon as the form comes from the press. For five or ten dollars you can get an assortment of stuff that will be useful as long as you have a house, if you make your selections carefully.

If Champ Clark is nominated on the Democratic ticket that release is going to be live until election day. Keep an eye on it and the cut. The text of the circular reads:

More Aladdin Stuff.

Under another cover comes a lot more Aladdin stuff, but the only indication that it is from Springfield is the imprint of the printer at the bottom of some of the stuff. Something out of the ordinary is a special matinee of "The Kiddies' Christmas," a rather belated subject. It is made a feature of an offer of a baseball outfit to the school represented by the greatest number of boys and a basket-ball to the school showing the greatest number of girls. The circular is embellished with cuts of a ball, bat, catcher's and pitcher's mitt and mask, and the lower half of the circular reads:

This Baseball Outfit to the School Represented by the Largest Number of Boys Attending This Special Matinee.
A Basket-ball to the School Represented by the Largest Number of Girls Attending This Special Matinee.

Perforating rule makes it possible to tear off the coupon and vote it. Note that "Teachers Free." It is a good line.

Several others of the circulars make good reading; a special bill listing "Charlie's Reform" and "The Illumination," making a double bill of unusual worth, while Taft signing the Arizona statehood bill and "How Washington Crossed the Delawae," form another double attraction.

Some Specials.

Make a note of these Edison specials. They are a bit better than the usual in subject or development, and will stand a bit more booming than the regular release.

The first of these is "The Shadow on the Blind," the release for June 8, recently the subject of a special article (see page 720 of the issue of May 25th), in which the story is sketched. This is one of the Sir Henry Furniss stories (though he does not appear to have used his title in connection with his picture work). It is better than "The Artist and the Brain Specialist," and funny in American fashion, as are all of these products of the clever Englishman. He is not English, he is international in his humor. Play the subject up and you'll get the full value.

"Ten Days with a Fleet of U. S. Battleships" is a subject made with the collaboration of the Navy Department, which has come to realize the recruiting value of the pictures. It is the sort of thing with which you can make special appeal to the schools and to the youngsters, though no one is insensible to the appeal of the flag.

"A Prisoner of War," the last of the trio, we have not seen, but it is pronounced "an uncommonly spectacular film," showing the last days of Napoleon at St. Helena. Mark these down on your list and make a special fuss. It will be well worth worth while.

And don't forget Martin Chuzzlewit. There are the libraries and the literary clubs. Go get them.

A New Layout.

H. M. Edwards, of the Bijou Dream, Milton, Pa., sends in a new form of weekly program. He writes that he has sent in a page story of "The Coming of Columbus," but this has not turned up yet, and will be held over. The program interests us because it is simple, comprehensive and inexpensive. It is printed on common news paper, 10¼ by 15. It is set four columns to the page and with the first two columns of the first page given to a resume of the week, there are six columns left for the six days.

The first two columns are two columns wide and give inch and a half spaces to the feature for each day. The daily column gives the musical program for each day (changed daily), and a synopsis of some or all of the reels as the space permits. Advertisements top and bottom on the back page and the bottom of the first page help pay the printer, and probably cuts the cost to nothing at all. It is not pretentious, but it covers the week intelligently and effectively, and if you cannot afford an expensive layout we think you can follow this plan to better advantage than any of the other two-page sheets we have seen.

Mr. Edwards adds that this is one of the finest theaters in the State with a mirror screen, two machines, and a four-piece orchestra that knows how to play the pictures. The importance given the musical program argues the latter and we think the musical program counts. It you are interested we think that Mr. Edwards will send you a copy if you enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Mr. Perry On the Job.

George D. Perry, of the U-Kum Theater, Toronto, sends in a letter and some sample slides. We give the former:

> I thank you for the criticism on our program and will adopt your suggestion reheading. Some few days ago I mailed copies of recent programs to show you that we are using The World to our advantage.
> In this I enclose proofs of some slides we use nightly, thinking perhaps the idea might help some one else. We had difficulty in handling our audience (every exhibitor has the same). There was apparently no move on the part of patrons to pass out until after the picture was on the screen and then the view of those who had not seen the picture was interrupted. We purchased a few fonts of type and a small handpress, 4 x 6, and these slides, printed on gelatine paper and enclosed in glass, are printed after we receive our programme from the exchange. After every film we put on a slide announcing the next picture and the results are surprising. Those who have seen the picture pass out before the next is on the screen and on Friday and Saturday last, which were exceptionally busy days with us, I venture to say there was not a dozen people went out during the time a picture was being shown We handled more people and with far less effort than on ordinary night. This idea may be in use elsewhere but it is original with us. Friday evening was the first time we used it and I kept particular watch to see how it worked out.
> If it will help some other brother, pass it on. There is a movement on foot here to form a Producers' and Exhibitors' Association for the Province of Ontario in order to protect the interests of those engaged in the business. Not before it is necessary either, as many of the people look on the picture show very much the same as the Chinese described by Mr. Brodsky.
>
> Will send you report of the meeting, etc., if you would care to have it.

Why Not You?

Mr. Perry comes pretty close to where we live. We have a 5 x 8 press that cost us $18 and about $50 worth of type. It has more than paid for itself in the past few years. A 3 x 5 press can be had for $5 and enough type for another $5 to do all slide printing. The slides read:

THE NEXT PHOTO PLAY ON OUR PROGRAM IS ENTITLED
MY DOUBLE AND HOW HE UNDID ME
Those who have seen this number will kindly pass out the side door. Those who remain will confer a favor by taking seats as near the inside of the row as possible.

We can only suggest that if Mr. Read will varnish the plain paper or else sprinkle it with powdered wax or parafine he will get a better effect than with gelatine since either will render the paper translucent. If the wax is used, pass a hot iron over the paper to melt the substance into the paper. The prepared slides sent out by some of the companies are no more than varnished paper, but varnish takes some time to dry and the waxed paper is all right as soon as it is cold.

The use of an announcement slide to get the crowd out is almost a necessity. Let them know what is coming and start the exodus before the reel starts. This is advice we gave long ago, but it cannot be too frequently repeated. Try a small press. It is not as difficult as it sounds. For the benefit of others we would say that the slide is set in heavy copperplate gothic No. 23 (6 point) and No. 25 and No. 27 (12 point), with an ornament we do not place. The two sizes of 12 point serve as capitals and lower case.

What C. T. Smithers Suggests.

C. T. Smithers, of the Idle Hour Circuit, Aberdeen and Watertown, S. D., writes:

> I am always interested in this department and glad to note so many exhibitors are sending in suggestions. To advertise entertainments of any kind and make a success is an art in itself and I am gaining some good information from this section of The Moving Picture World. Advertising must at all times be followed up by delivering the goods or it is money and time thrown away. The idea of advertising every show as a feature show when it is just ordinary will in the end work against the house. When you know you have a good thing push it hard and never fool your patrons at any time. I use the daily papers a whole lot and my monthly bills look big; but I get the crowds and consider it a paying investment. I always use a standing ad giving the program and a short synopsis of each film, I then use small readers that are continually pointing to that ad, changing these every time I change the program. When some big feature comes along I add to this some good readers sometimes a half column in length. The heralds and dodgers are O. K. if properly distributed; but there are so many of these that are thrown away that I consider them the most expensive advertising I can get. The direct appeal by postcard or circular letter is a fine thing to awaken them when crowds are getting slow. Always make the appeal when you know you have a fine show and feature. I enclose a dodger used for "Cry of the Children." Just at this time Roosevelt is in the limelight and it is bound to catch attention when an ordinary dodger would fail.
> When I have a big feature I run up my six-foot box kite and use a banner on a string 9 x 18 feet, calling attention to the fact that the Idle Hour has a big feature. It certainly is a good ad and I have received lots of comment from the same. It is an old stunt, but it works.

Anything for a Signal.

We do not imagine that most persons can read even the size banner that Mr. Smithers flaunts, but they see the kite, they know that there is a feature at the Idle Hour and they go because they are not "stung" on the feature announcements. If you have the nerve to hold back on the kite until you are positive that you really have something extra good, we can see where a kite or any other special form of advertisement will make for extra business. Don't play hunches. See the reel yourself. Make certain that it is something special, then make a fuss over it and whether it be a kite, a sandwich-man or any other form of announcement it is proof positive that the show is better than usual and you will reap a reward. Of course any form of advertisement may be overdone and you will lose trade instead of bringing it, but if you have the reputation of making good and are level headed enough to hold back until your reels will make good for you, the use of some special sign of a special show will bring back big money. It doesn't matter what it is you use so that its use comes to be known as the sign of an extra good show.

Likes Good Music.

The following seems to cover the ground without comment. It is from M. Needle, who conducts the Auditorium at 172 West 23rd Street. He writes:

> I have recently had an experience with judicious advertising which should be of interest to other exhibitors. The opportunity presented itself when I secured Kalem's feature picture "War's Havoc."
> This film was included in my regular program of Friday, May 10th, and I recognized the title as a particularly good one to display. I therefore looked up the Kalendar sent me by the Kalem Company and found that special piano music was provided for this film and that special one, three and six-sheet four-color lithograph posters could be obtained. I purchased the music and the pictorial paper. The three and six sheet posters were put up on boards alongside my entrance and the one-sheets were placed on my regular boards at each corner of the entrance. I announced in an attractive manner that music especially prepared for this production would be played during the exhibition. This music, by the way, was simply arranged and presented no difficulties for my pianist. My gross advertising expense did not exceed $2.00 and my receipts were 25 per cent. greater than on any Friday in the history of my theater.
> I ascribe the excellent business to the proper announcement of the film and the advertising of the fact that the picture would be accompanied by music especially written for this picture.

Do It Right.

We want to quarrel with several unnamed houses that have sent in programs with condensed versions of the manufacturers' bulletins, but some of these have been cut down for program purposes to the point where they lose all value. Take, for example, the following:

> "CHOLERA ON THE PLAINS"
> The story of a settler and his family who have cholera. They continue to trade with the Indians with the result that the tribe contracts the dread disease and is forced to seek a new home for the camp. After the scourge has spent its force they find the settler and his family all sick.

Would you go across the street, or half-way across the street, or over on the next block to see this? The family gets cholera, the Indians get the cholera. Then the Indians find that the settlers have the cholera. Turn to the description of the Pathe release and you will find that this story stops when the real story starts. An Indian boy finds the family dying of the scourge. They give him in charge the little daughter, untainted by the disease, and here is where the real story comes. It is a real story; a vital story, but nothing that suggests this appears in the printed description. It is a waste of money to print such stuff. Unless you can write the sort of description that makes people want to come and see the picture you are simply helping to support some possibly deserving printer and getting nothing in return.

If you can't condense the stories yourself hire someone who can or stop wasting your money. This sort of thing is purely and simply a waste of real money that might better be spent in lithos for the lobby.

What Advertising Is.

Advertising is something to whet the popular interest. You are supposed to tell enough of a story to make people want to hear the rest. You rouse curiosity and leave it unsatisfied. Every advertisement should be a sort of "Continued in our next," the "next" in this case being the showing of the film on the screen. Just a single situation picked up and made prominent is worth a page of rambling reading that starts nowhere and ends the same place. It is not difficult to work intelligently. The trick of condensation is easily learned, and if you cannot learn it it is a simple matter to at least pick up the strong paragraph and use only that. Take the Pathe release, for instance. Suppose you cannot condense the story to a four line length. Try this:

> Cholera attacks the settlers and is communicated to the Indians. The settler's child is alone unaffected and by them is given to the care of an Indian boy. Her life in camp—and after—makes this a vivid and gripping photoplay, starting from this dramatic incident.

It doesn't seem so difficult, does it? It isn't any more difficult than it looks.

Get Busy.

Read up on Martin Chuzzlewit. It's coming and before it comes you'll want to know all about it. There are some people who will not catch the story from the film and they'll ask you about it. You don't want to stand around and confess you don't know, do you? Read up. The book may be had of any library if it is not in your home collection and it will not take much of your time to run through if you read rapidly. It's these little things that count. You're the manager of the theater and when you do not know about the stuff you run how can you expect others to regard you with proper respect? When you have a special based on a story, read that story and be posted. It may seem like a lot of trouble for nothing, but it is one of the things that counts in the long run and even though you may not be questioned about the story, the fact that you are ready to be quizzed gives you a confidence that will have its due effect.

The exhibitor of to-day is vastly different from the small showman of a few years ago. He is someone in the small community and someone in the section of the city in which his house is set. He is looked up to in a sense as being one of the dignitaries and when he is questioned he must be ready to respond. He must answer quickly and correctly and intelligently as well. It may be more or less of a nuisance to read up, but it is essential, so do it, whether the release be Martin Chuzzlewit or Jess or The Life of Napoleon. It will pay.

Do You Use the World?

The subscription price of the Moving Picture World is three dollars a year. That is what it is supposed to be worth to the man who wants to read it and keep in touch with affairs in moving pictures. Is the World worth three dollars to you or do you make it worth much more? We know some exhibitors who get hundreds of dollars worth of value out of a file of fifty-two papers. We do not know any exhibitor who cannot. Every week there is matter in these columns that is worth many times the price of a year's subscription to the man who knows how to use it. There are comments on the film that will enable you to get out a circular that is better than usual, there is comment and advice from all of the manufacturers whose reels you use. All of this is yours if you know how to use it, and the really clever man makes intelligent use of the material at hand. You say, for example, that a film is good. The public thinks you have to say it, because the film is being run. But perhaps the story is one of those that have attracted the particular attention of the staff writers. Perhaps from two to six cuts of the subject have been used. Why not paste this up on your bulletin board. Make full use of the paper credit. It is not your biased opinion. It is newspaper comment, and the comment of the leading film paper. Put it up where it can do you some good. People will stop to read. Some will stop to see. You'll soon find that you do not have to pay three dollars a year for the paper, but that the paper pays you a direct and important profit in business gained. You are cheating yourself unless you make the fullest use of every possible means of attracting attention, and the man who does not use the special stories on his boards is losing what he pays for. Think it over. This is not an advertisement for the paper. It's a tip to you.

ROY APPLEGATE WITH LUBIN.

Roy Applegate, late of the Shubert forces, has joined the Lubin Stock Company. His position is assistant director of the company managed by Arthur V. Johnson, which is confined strictly to drama.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

MORE ABOUT MARKETS.

NESTOR FILM CO. (Richard Willis, Editor), Hollywood, Cal. The editor states that Western stories are being purchased, though the head of the company announces that they are not buying. There are records of recent sales. Independent.

VICTOR FILM MANUFACTURING CO. (Giles R. Warren, Editor), 573 11th avenue, New York City. This company has been formed to present photoplays in which Miss Florence Lawrence will be the star. Both comedies and drama will be done, but the stories must be unusually good. The market is limited since but one story a week is done, and the Editor will write many of these himself. Independent.

THE POWERS CO. (C. B. Hoadley, Editor), 422 West 216 street, New York City. Can use Eastern, comedy and melodramas, light comedies and half-reel farces. See a recent issue for particulars of a prize contest. Independent.

AMERICAN FILM MANUFACTURING CO. (Omer F. Doud, Editor), 5th floor, Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill. Can use Eastern and Western drama, melodrama and comedy drama. All sorts of comedy subjects and an occasional costume play. Independent.

The Thousand-Foot Reel.

IF the writer were asked the cause most prominent in holding back the development of the photoplay the answer would be the fixed length of the reel. The fixed length of the release is a convenient commercial standard, but it does not make for artistic production.

In some studios where each scene is timed by a stop watch and the action is condensed into the proper length before the camera is turned, it is possible to get an approximately good result, but there are comparatively few studios where the cutting is done before the negative is made, and the thousand-foot picture may be turned in as a fourteen or fifteen hundred foot picture without leader.

It is commercial law that the picture must not run more than a thousand feet, because the exchanges want that length, and so the story is mutilated to get the film down to the limit. Sometimes whole scenes are eliminated or replaced with a hastily written leader, or the story may be altered to permit the dropping of some of the surplus material. In any case the story suffers.

The magazine proprietor who should demand of his editors that all stories in his magazine should run precisely five pages each would soon find that he was bringing out a mighty poor offering in the way of reading matter. He would become the laughing stock of the magazine world because all editors know that to put a six-thousand word story into five thousand words would ruin the author's style. Even in syndicate work, where the semblance of uniformity is essential, there is a play of about one-fifth of the length of the story; a "daily short," for example, running between 1,200 and 1,500 words, instead of being always the longer or the shorter length.

There are hundreds of photoplays done that cannot possibly be done right in less than 1,200 or 1,500 feet, and yet the manufacturer who presumed to offer an additional 200 feet to the exchanges, would find his standing orders dropping off alarmingly. It is business, of course. The additional 200 feet means an increase in the running expenses of the exchange by about $18, and this point alone seems to be important to the exchange, but it is hard on the man who has written a 1,200-foot story, and whose narrative is maimed and mutilated because of the standard length.

It works the other way, as well, for often a story will not go more than 800, but is stretched an additional 150 or 200 feet to make length, or else an alleged industrial, far too short to be worth while, is tacked on to make up the run.

Some day the open market, which this paper has ever advocated, will become an accomplished fact, and then we shall have pictures running about a thousand feet, but with a reasonable margin in either direction for over or under run. Just now the film's the thing, but when manufacturers come to realize that it is no more intelligent to always run from 950 to 1,000 feet than it is to stipulate that the girls in the joining room shall be between five feet five and five feet six, we shall have films from 800 to 1,200 feet, and in the long run the average of cost will be the same.

Almost a Scandal.

Recently the Nestor and Majestic companies released the same photoplay under the titles of "Buncoed" and "Three of a Kind." As it developed that David Morrison, of Philadelphia, had written, and sold both stories, it looked like a scandal until explanations were forthcoming, when it was shown that Mr. Morrison was not dishonest, but merely careless.

It appears that the script was first submitted by him to the Majestic, and by them was rejected. The script was then sent to the Nestor company. Meantime, the Majestic asked for the script again and produced it. This transaction was completed when the Nestor sent a check stating that they had produced the story. The check was returned to them with explanations, but meantime the story was released.

In some small measure the Nestor people are to blame for slow action, but Mr. Morrison should not have sent a duplicate script to the Majestic until he had first received the Nestor script back, even if they had kept it for some time without action.

The moral of all this is that it is dangerous to have more than one copy of a script in the market at one time. Mr. Morrison was entirely honest in this matter, yet he has gotten himself disliked by two firms, and perhaps others, and all because he did not observe one of the fundamental rules of the literary game.

If you are so fortunate as to have your script reconsidered, first get it back from the second company before making submission to the first again. You are certain of your sale, and it is dangerous to leave your scripts laying around loose, particularly in a business where many buyers first produce a play, and then notify of acceptance.

Warren With Victor.

As might have been expected Giles R. Warren is to be the editor of the new Victor company, which Miss Florence Lawrence will head. He was the editor for the Imp company during her stay with them, and for the Lubin company when she changed her film address. Now that she is playing again he is presiding over the photoplay department and will write many of the plays himself. With the same director and the same editor, Miss Lawrence is fortunate in having the support of the two men who have so materially contributed to her success in the past—Mr. Warren knows precisely the sort of story to give her, and Mr. Salter can make the most of the material supplied.

During his stay with the Powers company Mr. Warren organized the photoplay department and leaves the perfected organization to the competent care of C. B. Hoadley.

Good News.

Mr. Thorvald Solberg, Register of copyrights, who is genuinely interested in the matter of copyright privilege for photoplay, despite the belief of some to the contrary, sends a copy of the amended Townsend bill, in which a new class is provided for "Motion Picture Photoplays," and another for "Motion Pictures Other Than Photoplays." Under the former classification the infringing producer may be penalized one dollar for every infringing copy.

It will be noted that the wording of this bill recognizes photoplay as the proper title for a script for the making of a motion picture. We are glad to see that this position is taken. The photoplaywright has a splendid friend at court in Mr. Solberg.

Want to Eat.

Charles Gaskill, who is inventor of the word "interscript," wants to quit the argument and buy a dinner for those who have been disputing with him. Spectator approves the dinner suggestion, but thinks that a dinner of all handy photoplaywriters would be better than the exclusive function Mr. Gaskill plans.

Life would be dull and drear if we always agreed with "dear Spec," but we are strong for his dinner idea. If you are a photoplaywright and live within twenty miles of the New York City Hall, let's have your ideas on the subject, and perhaps it can be arranged that the writers of photoplay shall have a chance to get together. There are a lot of good fellows in the photoplay ranks who should know each other better and this looks like a splendid chance to get together. It is not the first move toward the formation of a society or anything of that sort; it's just a suggestion that we all get together to have a bite to eat and many things to say. The first dinner, at any rate, will be a stag. The only other requirement than sex is that the author shall have had accepted for production at least five original photoplays. Now let's hear from you chaps.

Kalem Komedies.

A. Van Buren Powell sends in this extract from a letter from Phil Lang, of the Kalem company, which may interest others who are trying for Kalem comedies. The advice is applicable to all photocomedies, and if you are able to write these half-heels you'll find that you have the inside track on the market. It might also be remarked that Mr. Lang likes scripts to be double spaced and with punctuation marks in place of the usual dashes. This is a departure from the usual form, but if it's what the editor wants you know the answer. Mr. Lang writes:

> It will be necessary to make some eliminations in this scenario, as it will be made into a half-reel, 500 feet in length. * * * In submitting us comedy subjects, it will be well to bear in mind that the only comedies we are making are 500 feet in length. * * * You will note in subjects of this length that usually only one incident is developed, the action being the building up of this affair, though, of course, there are exceptions, but not many. * * We do not like the comedy-drama, but prefer the subject that opens with a funny situation, succeeding scenes developing the fun. * * * By sending your manuscripts to Kalem for first reading you will find that they are always acted upon promptly.

"Going Down!"

Here's a little side light on the correspondence school graft from a correspondent who wants to know:

> The history of the enclosed might interest you.
> Some six months ago I sent a request for information regarding The National Authors' Institute Photo-play course, and received a circular offering me ten lessons at $2 per lesson. A little later, I received another offer from them offering me the ten lesson course for $10, or if I paid cash, $8, for the entire course. A little later, I received another offer of $5 cash for the entire course. Now the enclosed—$2, for the ten lessons.
> I answered the advertisement more as an experiment. I have been fairly successful in writing photo-plays, and needed no more technical training than derived from your articles on the "Technique of the Photo Play," published last year.
> However, that is not the point of this letter. You will note that on the orange sheet enclosed from the "Institute," is a quotation as follows:
> Mr. Hall writes: "During the 12 months ended June 30 last I devoted about one-half of my working time to scenario writing, and with 12 scripts to hear from, find that line netted me the useful sum of $1,485."
>
> Directly underneath this is the following:
> "The Moving Picture World, the most reliable moving picture trade journal in the United States, will verify this quotation."
> This gives the impression that Mr Hall is one of their graduates and that the letter was written to them and that the Moving Picture World can verify that fact.

> I am just wondering how the poor "dupes" who have paid and are paying $2 per lesson for the 10 lessons would feel on learning that they could get the course for $18 less.

This is a photoplay school with a New York address. It is by no means the only school using the quotation from an article written by Mr. Hall for this paper. It is one of the big arguments of a school out in Ohio, the conductor of which will write anything from a joke to a four-act play.

Just as a matter of record Emmett Campbell Hall antedates the earliest of the correspondence schools by several months—about six, at least. We were among the first to buy the Hall scripts and even then his technique attracted attention. He gained his information in part from the sheets furnished by the manufacturers, and in part from a series of articles written in one of the magazines for authors, but mostly he had it in him. He was at no time a pupil of any school, book or association. He had it in him and he worked it out. His study was the study of obvious conditions by an intelligent and well trained writer.

With this introduction listen to this gaudy paragraph from the letter in question:

> Of course, there can be no profit to us in giving you our lessons for two dollars. But we are anxious to train more writers and thereby increase our scenario brokerage business. That is the reason we make you this offer. We will act as your selling agent and take 5 per cent. as our commission. In this way we will make a commission of $50 on every $1,000 worth of plots we sell for you. Here is where we hope to reap our reward.

This listens well; that $1,000 sale, but there is not a brokerage agency in the United States that ever disposed of $1,000 worth of scripts of any one author, and we do not believe that any of the concerns as constituted ever can. If you can write you can sell yourself, just as well as any agency can. Be wise.

Another Script Record.

We are indebted to Charles Roy Cox, of Columbus, Ohio, for a new wrinkle in recording scripts, the feature of the system being that the carbon of the photoplay and its record are kept together. Mr. Cox uses manila envelopes of the sort used by most authors as a return envelope, about 4 by 9 inches. At the top of the address side he types the title of the photoplay and records the name of the company to which he sends it, and the date. The carbon is slipped inside the envelope, which is then placed with the others. In the event of a return the return date is typed, and the name of the second company and the sending date written in. When a sale is made the facts are recorded and the envelope is sealed and filed away with the carbon. It is practically the card system already described in these columns, but the use of envelopes instead of cards is a novel idea and presents many advantages.

What Bill Kitchell Thinks.

There are a couple of good ideas in a recent letter from William H. Kitchell. He writes: "I am thinking of re-writing my .... stuff that comes back for .... and so down the list, shaping the story to fit the particular company to which it is to be submitted."

That means a lot of work just at the time the Newark baseball team is trying to keep from being licked again, but we think it a good idea for those who know the studio styles. Each manufacturer has certain more or less well defined ideas as to what he does and does not want, and the man who caters to these little peculiarities will stand a better chance than the author who writes a story and just sends it around until it sells or dies.

The other chunk of Jersey wisdom is this: "I refuse to write until I get the plot I want worked out about as I want it, and then I put it through quickly."

There is a lot more in this than appears on the surface. Don't get an idea and sit right down at the machine and flounder along from start to finish. When you get an idea keep it mulling around in your head until you get it straightened out. Think out all the variants and side issues, put probability to the acid test, and scheme out just the way you want the action to lie. Then go to the machine and instead of looking at the keys and wondering what the next scene ought to be, you'll be able to get the whole story on the paper in proper order and with a spontaneity that you cannot obtain if you stew over the machine half a day in an effort to get the action to run right.

Don't Read—Write.

Once Bertram Adler, of the Thanhouser company, advised photoplay beginners to read stories in order that they might write them, and just the other day a correspondent put the same thing into slightly different words when she said "I read, read, read everything that I can, because I want to get ideas." And in the next paragraph she asks what limitations there are to the use of copyrighted material.

The advice and the idea are wrong. Don't read. Write. Write, and write and write. If you have an idea write it out into a photoplay, even if you know it won't make a good photoplay. If you have no idea write until one comes. Don't write what you read. Write ideas you think up, even if the ideas are poor. Write as many photoplays as you can find time for. Write one a day if you are able, but write. Now and then you'll hit on an idea that may seem good enough to send out, but most of the time, if you are level headed, you'll realize that the stuff is not good enough to pay postage on. If you can't think of a new idea, rewrite one of the old scripts, trying to give it a new twist, but keep on writing until you hate the sight of the typewriter and the click of the keys.

Some day you'll wake to the fact that you are turning out a better grade of work. You'll find that your style of handling situations has improved. You'll make the pleasant discovery that the photoplay you once almost wept over isn't such a bad little play after all now that you've written it over a dozen times. In a word or two you'll find that you are a fully qualified photoplaywright.

It won't come from reading. It comes only from WRITING.

Very Likely.

It is suggested by William Lord Wright that many unavailable photoplays might make good fiction since they represent the essence of action often lacking in short stories. The idea is a good one and we have already suggested that photoplay writing is good training for fiction work, and even better training for stage dramatics. The only trouble is that when turned into fiction, literary style is demanded, and the reason there are so many photoplaywrights is that many persons with good ideas lack the literary finish to make those ideas acceptable to the magazine editors. At the same time there are a lot of people who think that they cannot write who could in time turn out an acceptable story, if only they were willing to write for practice meantime. Literary style is to be gained only through practice, and if some of the photoplaywrights who never have tried the broader field would only practice, they would, in time, gain the perfection that comes only that way.

Go the Route.

We had a letter from a quitter the other day. He is a pretty good sort of chap, but now and then the braces under his knees give way and he flops. He writes something like this:

> What do you think of this letter of rejection? If they had said that it was the same old thing over again, I might have stood for it, but to be told that it is not in line with their policy when it is a .... story or nothing, makes me tired. I'm going to can it, because it is good nowhere else.

That's the way the quitter looks at it, but just as a matter of fact it was not a Blank story. It out-Blanked Blank until it has become a Dash, but the quitter, thinking only of the company he aimed at, was blinded to that fact, and instead of trying it on the other was ready to consign it to oblivion.

Keep your nerve and go the route. If Smith won't take it perhaps Jones will or Brown or Green or White. Keep it going until you are postive that you've tried every market, and if you're really game you'll fix it over and start it out again.

Don't ever lie down until you have to, and if you have the right spirit you'll never have to. Keep it going over the route, and when you've covered the route start it out again. Perhaps some other editor and directors are in the first place now, and they may like what the others didn't. Perhaps the same director may view it differently, but while there's life and postage stamps there's hope.

JENNY NELSON.

Jenny Nelson was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, and played for four years in the King's Theater. During this time she also posed for the artists of the city and later worked in the studios of Paris, New York and Philadelphia. She is a clever musician, favoring the violin, and has been successful in concert and vaudeville. She is a fearless rider and would rather fight a bucking broncho than toy with "a bottle and a bird." The above picture shows her in a characteristic makeup, a typical girl of the Golden West, which is her favorite line of work in the Lubin Stock Company.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"AN OUTCAST AMONG OUTCASTS" (Biograph), May 30.—A good melodramatic picture with strongly worked-out and very interesting contrasts. The picture's chief interest comes from the placing of the four yeggmen hoboes beside the "blanket stiff," or tramp, who carries his blanket, the showing of the hoboes' attitude toward him, and the logical development of the denouement from it. The blanket stiff is made a semi-cripple. This subtlely intensifies the distinction between him and the yeggs. Another strengthening contrast is in making the heroine's character, in this picture, whose chief purpose is to draw a rough and harsh experience, that of a sweet, unspoiled and very lovable girl and with all such a girl's helplessness. Her lover is skillfully drawn also, and sharply distinguished. The story is a little complicated by minor threads; but works out to clear and very effective climax. The photography is not up to Biograph standard.

"AN INNOCENT THEFT" (Vitagraph), May 28.—A picture with a very human and very pleasing situation, in which Kenneth Casey plays a very poor little boy with a sick mother in great distress at home. It is he who commits the innocent theft. He had been begging and followed some people into a church. They passed him a plate with money on it. He helped himself. Why not? His mother told him that the money was not intended for him, and, taking the coin back to the minister, he made friends and got a good job. The picture has a charm of its own. The audience seemed to enjoy it greatly. Kenneth Casey seems to be popular with the youngsters everywhere. There was a distinctly youthful note in the laughter that greeted him, at the end, in his bell-boy's uniform. Miss Helen Gardner plays the boy's mother and managed, at the critical moment, when the boy brought the minister to see her, to add much to the picture's sincerity. The photographs are very good.

"A RECONSTRUCTED REBEL" (Selig), May 30.—A picture that opens, as far as its action is concerned, with a few war scenes just after Lee's surrender. The hero, a C. S. A. colonel (Hobart Bosworth), refuses to take the oath of fealty to the Union, and, with his little daughter, escapes to a strange country where he raises the Stars and Bars and lives an exile. The picture's object is to work up, with increasing patriotic ferror, to a climax in which the Stars and Stripes can be shown gladly waving on the staff above the reconstructed colonel's house. To accomplished this, a United States consul with his son are introduced, and a love match made between the colonel's daughter and the young man. The fervor is created by making the inhabitants hate the Americans, by a riot, in which the flag is dishonored, by making the fiery colonel leap into the breech for the flag that once had been his, and finally by bringing a great United States dreadnought across the sea, and by having the white uniformed tars save not only the Stars and Stripes, but the Stars and Bars, too. The colonel was won by love, and himself hoisted the Stars and Stripes. The picture gets over, but it has too many unconvincing smaller things to be called a big picture. The camera work is only so-so. Because of its quality, it will be liked. It was applauded on Broadway.

"THE PICTURE IDOL" (Vitagraph), May 31.—The Vitagraph Company was well supplied with a leading man to play this situation—its own star romantic hero filled the bill. All the players seem to have enjoyed playing it; it is full of good comedy and made, on Broadway, where it was perhaps best understood, many good, appreciative laughs. A schoolgirl, played by Clara Kimball Young, falls in love with a picture hero, played by Maurice Costello. The girl's parents (Mr. Eldridge and Mrs. Maurice), as well as her schoolboy sweetheart (Mr. Morrison), are troubled. The father goes to see the picture idol and they make up a plan to disillusion the girl. His table manners made laughs, but didn't quite cure the girl; so they made up one of the boys as the idol's wife, and got four kids to come in from the street. This did the business. The camera work is very good.

"THE RUSTLER'S DAUGHTER" (Melies), May 30.—This picture shows some good scenery in the vicinity of Santa Paula, Cal. The title role is taken by Miss Mildred Bracken, who, as Molly, discovers, when her father and his men bring home a number of horses, that he is a rustler. The sheriff, in response to a complaint from the Governor, starts out alone and in disguise, to discover the thieves. On the edge of a cliff his saddle girth breaks, the sheriff is thrown down the rocks, and is found by Molly, who has seen the mishap. Molly assists the law officer to her home, where, on removing his coat, she discovers his star and instantly realizes his mission. The unfolding of the story, showing the sale of the horses, the entrance of the thieves into the house to divide the spoils, while Molly conceals the sheriff behind a door; the quarrel over the division of the money, the shooting of the father and the arrest of the culprits by the sheriff's men, who have come for him in response to his telephone message, is coherent and well done. The sheriff, of course, did not know he was in the presence of the thieves until the trouble started. With Molly's father dead and her sweetheart under arrest for his murder, she accepts the hand of the sheriff—somewhat sudden, to be sure, but it makes a good windup for a stirring melodrama.

"VIEWS IN CALCUTTA, INDIA" Scenic—(Edison), May 31.—An interesting series of pictures showing native sports and exercises. Also there are several views of the Calcutta Durbar, including groups in which King George and Queen Mary figure. One of the notable features of these scenes of regal splendor is the picture of the great car, with its seven-foot wheels.

"HIS WIFE'S WHIMS" (C. G. P. C.), May 31.—This is a comedy. The basis is the receipt of a note from Durand's doctor stating that his wife, owing to the fact that an important event is impending, must receive every consideration. The action begins when the husband follows his wife out on the street and, after she has "lifted" an article from a street stand, settles with the merchant and shows him the doctor's note. The wife then proceeds to her tailors, and after removing her outer garments retires to try on a new gown. A thief enters and arrays himself in the convenient feminine attire, the up-to-date headgear and attached veil concealing his features. Passing to the street he is followed by the husband, who continues settling accounts with indignant merchants until one uncompromising tradesman insists on an arrest. The husband follows to the station and is confronted by his wife in her new house gown. The latter tears the concealing headpiece from the imposter, and a well-developed comedy is brought to a laughable close.

"LIFE AMONG THE MURUTS" (C. G. P. C.), May 31.—On the same reel as the foregoing is a hand-colored film of life among the savage tribes of Borneo. When depicting scenes of tropical luxuriance the color work of this company shows to best advantage, and this picture is no exception.

"GLIMPSES OF BELGIUM" (Eclipse), May 29.—This is an interesting travelogue showing rivers and ancient cities.

"ROPE-MAKING BY HAND, IN KENT, ENGLAND" (Eclipse), May 29.—An educational film of interest, showing the manufacture of three-inch rope. The process, while undoubtedly archaic, is perhaps more interesting and understandable to the average "filmfan" than would be a demonstration of modern methods.

"SLIPPERY TOM" (Eclipse), May 29.—On the same reel as the foregoing two is this "tale of a thief." It is of the trick variety, the French comedy sort—of disappearance and reappearance.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S BIBLE" (Essanay), June 1.—This effective picture seems to us the most convincing bad man's conversion that we have seen. In a rough land where there is much outcropping of rock and big boulders, Broncho Billy and his pal hold up a stage. They toss up for first choice of two bags. Billy gets a Bible in his. He reads a little and places it in his pocket where, later, by stopping a bullet, it saves his life. Billy's mind has been impressed by this and when the same Bible takes an unconscious part in other happenings, he is still more impressed. Mr. Anderson gets a good deal over in this part. We like the picture; the audience seemed to like it. It is well made in every way.

"THE PRAYERS OF MANUELO" (Vitagraph), June 4.—A picture of two very simple hearted and devout Mexicans, Manuelo (played by George Stanley) and Papeta, his wife (by Ann Schaefer). Their lot in life is very lowly; but they appeal to a saint whose statue stands in its niche of wood at the desert's edge. The prayers are answered. We see it all as natural luck; Manuelo sees it as a miracle. The impression that the picture leaves is distinctly religious; it could hardly have been written by any one but a devout believer or by one in the surest sympathy with the simple folk he pictures. It seems to us out of the ordinary. A good picture, well acted, pretty well photographed.

"MISSIONARIES IN DARKEST AFRICA" (Kalem), June 3.—The first photoplay ever made in the heart of Africa, so the company announces on one of its screens. It is produced by Sidney Olcott from the story of Gene Gauntier, who plays the leading part. In the cast are two other Kalem players. The photography is good and the scenery interesting. One particularly striking picture is a river view—the old Nile, wide and placid; and over it steadily sailing a strange type of craft. The tribesmen take to photoplay work with the white brother, as readily as they do to his rum. In fact, they may be said to be enthusiastic. The story is of two missionaries, father and daughter, who are making fair headway with the savages until the chief of the band falls in love with or at least wants the daughter, and brings gifts to further his suit. He is denied. The father is struck on the head, the daughter is taken prisoner, and in the view of the chief in a nearby hut, stabs herself. The picture is well worth seeing.

"ALGY, THE WATCHMAN" (Biograph), June 3.—This is a comedy-melodrama not particularly striking in either feature. The work of the players is up to the Biograph standard; the scenario is not. There are some laughs in it.

"TOMBOY BESSIE" (Biograph), June 3.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this farce-comedy. It is the story of a mischievous girl—with a lenient and sympathizing father whose chief delight is making things unpleasant for her older sister and the boob who tries to court her. The audience by its laughter indicated its approval.

"THE LAUREL WREATH OF FAME" (Essanay), May 31.—This play, the product of the Chicago Company, was well received by the audience. Guido, a composer, through the death of his mother, is left alone in the world. He is in love with Marie Medici, a singer, who has sung some of his compositions; she prefers her musical career, however, to becoming his wife. Maria ascends in the scale; Guido fails in his battle with fame. Guido later meets Maria, she recognizes him, and sends her maid to learn his lodging house, which is in a garret. Maria goes to see Guido, and promises to sing one of his compositions. She does so, and the song is a success. Guido, meantime, has been ejected by his landlord, and in his despair temporarily loses his reason. When he finally learns of his success the reaction kills him. Maria falls grief-stricken over his body.

"THE HIGH COST OF LIVING" (Edison), June 4.—A good comedy. The basis is the rejection of the suit for the hand of the daughter of a foodstuff millionaire by his private secretary. The father calls attention to her extravagance and the extreme high prices. The daughter gets to work. She organizes women's clubs and secures a membership of 750,000. By a secret contract with an advertising agency advertisements are to be inserted in all papers; the ad is to consist simply of one or two numbers, which represent, for instance, butter and eggs, according to a well-understood schedule. On the publication of the numbers the entire membership boycotts the particular article. The scheme works. In three days the father loses $25,609.78. The daughter saves on her household expenses $1.46. The father throws up his hands. His secretary gets the girl, with the injunction not to permit his wife to economize.

"WHEN THE HEART CALLS" (Selig), June 4.—This is a good type of Western Indian drama. White Bird, a girl who had been adopted by Indians following the wiping out of the other members of her family, chooses to go with her Indian lover rather than return to the ways of civilization. The acting is good. White Bird is especially interesting. The concluding picture, White Bird and her lover standing on a rock, silhouetted against the sky, is particularly effective.

"INTO THE JUNGLE" (Kalem), May 31.—Surely in the latter part of this picture there is plenty of jungle—the kind that holds the attention of the man and woman—and child—who pay money to see pictures. The two men who take the parts of rivals for the hand of the girl do good work in their roles. Likewise does the young woman who plays the heroine get from her department all there is to be desired. The action throughout is uniformly smooth.

"MAX SETS THE FASHION" (C. G. P. C.), June 4.—Truly the audience found this farce picture a scream; there was laughter still even when the song and dance that followed had begun. There is something in it, in kind, very much like Max Linder's former farces, but it is absolutely fresh and we, the reviewer, are laughing again as we write with the memory of it fresh in our mind and this is the day after we saw it.

"COSTUMES OF DIFFERENT PERIODS" (C. G. P. C.), June 4.—An educational picture of unusual interest. It is a colored picture and in quality is very much like the Paris fashion plate that this company gives to the "Pathe Weekly." The costumes shown cover a long vista of history and they are very gracefully posed. It is a picture that should be very welcome to schools. In fact, the exhibitor should make an effort to have teachers of history in his town bring their classes to see it. It will repay the teachers to do this, especially teachers of French history and those teachers will probably thank the exhibitor. There are about fifteen different costumes given.

"A ROMANCE OF THE BORDER" (Lubin), June 3.—A melodrama of a stereotyped model in which the heroine's father is the heroic character. He is a sergeant; the villain is a captain in the U. S. Army. There is much that is interesting in the picture and some evry good desert scenes; but there is too much conversation, and even action, that is not clearly understood for the picture to be deeply emotional. The story is clear; but the motivation of its characters doesn't move us strongly. It gives good entertainment for a hot afternoon or evening. It is well acted; the photography is good.

"WHO'S TO WIN?" (Vitagraph), June 3.—A comedy in which John Bunny and Wm. Shea play rival suitors for the hand and the affections of Kate Price, "a poor lone widow whom nobody loves." These two fall out over the widow. Mr. Eldridge plays a kindly old man who tries to make peace between the two. He doesn't seem to care very greatly for the widow himself; but she grows to care for him. He wins. It makes a good picture. There is very little in it that is not laughably amusing. A large uptown audience found it a "scream." We enjoyed it with them. The photography is, of course, excellent.

"AN EVENTFUL ELOPMENT" (Vitagraph), June 1.—A fresh, amusing comedy situation is well developed in this picture. Bunny and Kate Price play a couple who object to the lover (Mr. Morrison) of their daughter (Lillian Walker). Bunny has the gout and his bandaged foot couldn't be put in a bushel basket. On the other side of the picture Mr. Eldridge and Mrs. Maurice play a couple who are delighted with the lover (Mr. Powers) of their daughter (Miss Theby). The four young people are friends. With the help of the happy pair, the other pair are planning to elope. Bunny employs a "scream" detective (Mr. Phillips) who gets the wrong couple while the others are at the minister's. It made many hearty laughs. The photography is as usual.

"A WHIRLWIND COURTSHIP ON BRADON'S RANCH" (Pathe), June 1—A vivacious courtship farce in which the lover does an unusually convincing female impersonation. Bradon objects to the young man as his daughter's sweetheart and wants her to marry the foreman. The youth gets fired and comes back as the new school teacher. The whirlwind, in its course, makes a monkey out of the foreman. It is skillfully developed and speedy. It made a good deal of laughter. The photography seems to be good; it was dimly projected where we saw it, but even so was at least clear.

"THE PUPPET'S HOUR" (Lubin), May 29.—An artistic picture with a poetic preachment clearly brought out and pleasing in its popular appeal. It is a picture with many beautiful scenes. Mr. Jack Halliday and Miss Ormi Hawley play the leads, the first as a young man engaged to a girl whom he knows is true hearted, but who is homely. He is a lover of beauty, and has begun to doubt. It is New Year's Eve and a misdirected letter has shown the man's state of mind to the girl. She sends back his ring. At this point, a fantasy is introduced and the man is given a part in it in order to teach him a lesson. Using this little fairy story thus seems more effective than the usual way of having the man dream. Miss Hawley plays in this a beautiful doll, to whom Santa Claus has given an hour's real life. The man falls in love with her; but what happens because she overstays her time teaches the man his lesson. He makes up with his sweetheart. Making such pictures as this seems to be one of Lubin's strong points. They do this better than most makers.

"THE WESTMINSTER KENNEL CLUB DOG SHOW" (Edison), June 1.—There may be some who are not interested in dogs; but the great majority of us are very much so. This excellent picture of many fine dogs seemed to be very popular. It is an excellent offering.

"EDDIE'S EXPLOIT" (Edison), June 1.—On the same reel is this pleasing comedy in which the little Edison player, a lad of about five, and Rowdy, the well-remembered and always pleasing, have the leads. It is a slight truthful picture of a very human youngster's sad adventure, from which his canine playmate helps to extract him. The Edison Company has chosen the two halves of this split reel very wisely. They make a desirable offering.

"THE BOGUS PROFESSOR" (Cines), June 1.—Shows the amusing predicament of a lover who is posing as the piano teacher of the girl. He can't play at all. It is amusing. It has freshness and vivacity.

"ROME ON THE TIBER" (Cines), June 1.—A very excellent colored picture of substantial length. These river views of Rome are quite new to us. They are delightfully clear and interested a large audience. This is a beautiful picture and makes a desirable offering.

"FOR THE HONOR OF THE NAME" (Pathe), May 29.—A well-made picture, full of beautiful scenes and with an extremely artistic closing picture that, in its untrammeled composition, its graceful lines and drapery, forcefully remind one of such paintings, minus color, as "The Madonna of the Tub," by Raphael. It is a modern picture of society life, in which a wise-hearted girl sacrifices herself to protect not only her sister from misplaced passion, but her sister's husband from knowing it. The meaning of the picture is much deeper than its name indicates. It faintly suggests from what seed and in what ground the girl's wisdom had grown. The handling of the situation, especially as regards the acting, might have been a bit less constrained by convention; but that is merely a matter of opinion. It is an effective and commendable picture. It is set in and about a fine country place, with extensive and beautiful grounds and tasteful interiors. The photographs are very good.

"THE PART OF HER LIFE" (Selig), May 31.—The world "part" in this title refers to a role, a part in a play, and it seems to imply that the pretty heroine never had any other part offered to her. She gave this part up. It wasn't because she was a poor actress, but otherwise. She was so good an actress that when she practised it she got the neighborhood and all the neighbors "worked up." It resulted in giving her bad dreams, so she hurried back to the manager with it. We found it a very enjoyable little comedy and the audience got much merriment from it. It is well made, acted and photographed.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS" (Selig), May 21.—This is No. 5 in this series. Warm weather audiences seem to like these farces.

"THE GENT FROM HONDURAS" (Kalem), May 29.—Roost, a character that will be remembered, comes back in this picture with some other of our darkey friends. Roost is now in love with a dusky manicure lady; but she prefers a "gent" in gorgeous uniform from Honduras. It seemed to tickle the audience not a little; but it isn't quite so fresh or sincere as the other Kalem picture in which these characters appeared.

"LUXOR, EGYPT" (Kalem), May 29.—A series of views taken at Luxor and Karnack. They include some street scenes and a few vocational pictures. It is not an impressive series; but it is interesting and instructive. The camera work is very good.

Independent.

"THE MOUNTAIN DAISY" (Nestor), June 5.—This mountain daisy is a girl, of course, and is like one of Burns' heroines. She is roughly dressed, has dark curls flowing over her shoulders and a very engaging smile, just the kind that the summer man from the city, who has come to the mountains to get photographs, would fall in love with. The handling of this very romantic situation with its elopement, its chase, giving thrilling scenes, hard riding and fast driving of a stage and six, its humor, is very competent and praiseworthy. The impression that it leaves is very pleasing, very satisfying.

"THE ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 12" (M. P. Dist. and Sales Co.), May 29.—The weekly topical is maintaining its high standard as an illustrated news picture. Late spring is the beginning of the convention season and we have a number of animated views of happenings at some of these. The most important of them and perhaps the most widely interesting, for they are not always pertinent news, is the Methodist Episcopal General Conference at Minneapolis. The discussions about the sin of dancing, smoking and playing cards that have arisen in it have given it a wide general interest. The picture of the Association of Ad Clubs and its recent convention at Dallas, makes a lively item; but one of little general news interest. The views of the celebration by Norsemen, of Norway's Independence Day at Chicago, make a very good item, as do the views of the ceremonies at Nice, in France, at the unveiling of a marble statue of Queen Victoria, of England. The Evensville, Ind., Field Day for its school children furnishes another interesting item. We also get some thrills in views of races. One of these is an automobile race at Santa Monica, California, during the recent celebration at Los Angeles. Others are the Paris and the Berlin cycle and motor cycle races. There are other items of less importance.

"REPARATION" (Republic), June 4.—A tragic love story set largely in New York City and its near suburbs. The hero is a college man; the heroine a suburban farmer's daughter. It is clearly told, well acted and has a poignant grip. It is a skilfully made picture; the scenes with their backgrounds are very effective. Some are beautiful. The buildings of the College of the City of New York furnish backgrounds for some of the best of them. There is also a glimpse of the Palisades in one scene. The ending is happy and the release will furnish every good entertainment. The photography is very good. A commendable picture.

"THE HARDEST WAY" (Eclair), June 4.—A story of a poor girl seeking to make a living in New York City. It shows her in her unsuccessful search to find any kind of a beginning, refusing to take the easiest way until, with no money at all and no place to go to, she falls into the snare that life sets for such as she. This is not, however, a typical picture of life; but a good, exciting and more or less romantic story. It is well acted, delicate in its handling of a rather sordid condition and clearly told. The camera has given it a good representation.

"BABIES, THREE" (Powers), June 5.—One was a human baby boy and the other two were kittens. Big sister (Miss Fritzi) sent a telegram when he came to Poppa who was out of town. Later, little sister found that two kittens also had come and, taking the initiative herself without telling anyone, sent a second telegram about two more babies. Poor poppa! He was much relieved when he got home. The little girl is the center of interest and she plays her part with charming skill. It doesn't make any pretences; but will be found amusing by the critical spectator even. It is well photographed.

"THERE'S MANY A SLIP" (Powers), June 5.—On the same reel is this bright courtship farce. It is slight, but very clever and the producer has made good entertainment of it. The girl in the case is played by Miss Fritzi and all who have roles do very well. The photography is very good.

"THE DERELICT" (Champion), June 3.—The derelict is a minister who became a drunkard after he was jilted by a woman who found that she could marry money. At the end of a most melodramatic series of incidents, he dies for a murder that the woman has committed. It is a poor picture in every way. There is little merit in it.

"THE SQUAW MAN" (Champion), June 5.—A picture with very little human truth in its situation. It tells how a white man who is rich falls out of love with a white sweetheart and marries his sister's Indian servant. It is told, not in the atmosphere of the open out-of-doors West; but in that of city apartments. The latter scenes, however, give glimpses of wild, free life. This part of the picture has some merit; but the first half is too tawdry to be deeply interesting. It is told as an Indian pipe dream; but we don't know this till the very end. The camera work is fair.

"WHOM GOD HATH JOINED" (Thanhouser), May 31.—Miss Snow and Mr. Cruze play the leads in this picture well supported by Miss La Badie and others of the Thanhouser Company that was in Florida this winter. The picture tells a good, substantial story in lowly scenes and backgrounds. These are well set on scenes to be typical and aid the story with suggestive atmosphere; but the producer hasn't depended upon any beauty except what the human situation afforded; he didn't need to. The situation is this: the wife of a young man is on a steamboat that is wrecked. She is saved; but her husband doesn't know it. Her husband, in his sorrow has left the village and she can't find him. She sees in a newspaper that the supposed widower is to be married again and comes in time to stop the wedding after a dramatic episode. It is a picture to thrill and make one hold his breath; yet also to satisfy the artistic feelings, because it is so well acted and so skillfully drawn. The camera work is very good. It is a very desirable picture.

"DOTTIE'S NEW DOLL" (Thanhouser), June 4.—Dottie is a pretty little girl of about four. There's another child in the picture, a baby, daughter of a judge who has just sentenced a Chinaman. The two nurse girls are Florence La Badie, for the older child, and Marguerite Snow, for the younger. Dottie broke her dolly and purloined the judge's baby for her new dolly. Nothing could be more fetching than the way the youngster is made to play this situation. It will make a roar of the very best kind of laughter and is, indeed, a little masterpiece of picture making. The child-player is a gem. We can't say anything that will give any real idea of the picture's quality. It is a joy forever. If any spectator is worried or grouchy, this will cure him. It will warm the heart of any human spectator.

"THE OTHER MAN" (Republic), June 1.—A melodramatic story in the costume of the 17th Century and set, for the most part, in and around a fine country house with wooded grounds. The place seems to be in England or Ireland; there is an old ruined castle in the neighborhood. The hero of the story has a double who is a robber. This suspicious character has been seen in the neighborhood and has made the heroine suspect that her fiance is unfaithful. The robber breaks into her father's house, is discovered and persued by soldiers. The hero and the robber have an encounter and the result of this is to clear the situation. The story needs to be followed closely and, at first, because of the fact that two characters look alike, it is obscure. In pictures where the hero, or any prominent character, has a double, it is wise to bring this fact out, even if it takes another leader. In this case, the point seems to have been left dark on purpose with the intention of producing a feeling of mystery. Yet, because of obscurity, something of vividness was lost that was more valuable than the mystery that was gained. The effect the producer wanted is easily obtainable in a novel; but hard to accomplish in a picture.

"AFTER MANY YEARS" (Lux), June 7.—A story of circus people. It deals with a domestic intrigue and the infidelity of a clown's wife who abandons her husband and child to run away with a trick pony rider. The poor clown goes to pieces and the child has to act the part in his father's stead. Fifteen years pass, and the little clown, now director of the circus, is, without knowing it, his mother's protector. Recognition and forgiveness follow. It is pretty well acted and, although it has a marked artificiality, as most circus pictures have had, it is interesting. There are seldom any real character drawing in such pictures; there is none in this; but the story is very clear. It is well photographed.

"ZANETTO'S MARRIAGE" (Gaumont), May 30.—A romantic, finely colored picture in courtly costume. Zanetto is a troubadour poet and slips into the sedan chair of a marquis which carries him to a romantic adventure in which he wins the heart of the gouty marquis' sweetheart for himself. It is not a deep situation. The picture is slight, artistic and pleasing. It stands on graceful acting, pretty scenes and good coloring.

"CARNIVOROUS ANIMALS" (Gaumont), May 30.—On the same reel is this series of motion photographs of caged beasts, taken in some zoological garden. They are very interesting and well photographed.

"THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER" (American), June 3.—The green-eyed monster is jealousy, and very quickly he brings interesting complications into this very well acted love story. It has a very clearly drawn situation in which Miss Von Trump and Mr. Kerrigan have the leads; but are very well supported, and to which sharp, skillfully chosen contrasts give intense vividness. The Flying A films seem to be coming back to their well-known vigor. This picture is a fresh and very commendable offering. The pictures were well photographed.

"HIS SECOND WIFE" (Powers), June 1.—The pleasing appearance of the players in this picture does much to keep us in sympathy with them; their natural, human acting gives to this personality its full force. The backgrounds, graceful and well chosen, also add much to the picture's charm. The story is good; it would be acceptable even in a much less pleasing dress; but, as it is, everything goes to make it pleasing. It is a double love story, wholesome and commendable. The photographs are very good.

"THE ART OF MAKING SILVER PLATE" (Imp), June 1.—A picture showing how fine silver table ware is made. It is another good contribution looking toward the future's large, well-informed public. The camera work is good.

"UP AGAINST IT" (Imp), June 1.—On the same reel is this good comedy, showing us the difficulties of a young man (King Baggot) temporarily in great poverty. He is at an evening dance given by his sweetheart (Miss Vivian Prescott) and the seat of his dress suit trousers gives out. The perplexing difficulties and the very embarrassing situations are very well acted and kept full of first class comedy spirit. It has nothing indelicate. Mr. Shay and Mr. Daly ably support the two leaders. The photography is beautiful. The two on this reel make a strong release, one to amuse and one to instruct; an excellent number for a warm evening.

"THE HALF-BREED'S WAY" (Nestor), June 3.—The pretty heroine, brought out of a pleasant house, near or in a city, is dismayed, at first, by the rough and slattern house on the ranch of her new husband. She looks out upon it through her long eyelashes and has a good cry. She then makes the place very homelike and comfortable, although her husband turns out to be a drunkard. The half-breed is a servant on the ranch, and helps the young wife faithfully, but her husband treats him rather brutally. The situation develops with dramatic suddenness into a startling climax. It is a picture that carries forward with a rush and sweep; vigor is its most prominent characteristic. It is not melodramatic; but a realistic and truthful though rather harsh picture of rough life. The photographs serve very well, some are fine.

"THE MIDNIGHT WEDDING" (Gaumont), June 2.—A sensational picture in two reels. The midnight wedding was extremely fashionable and the bride was very pretty. Large crowds were present at the big brilliantly lighted home of her father. There was also present a rejected lover insane with jealousy, and he had placed a charge of dynamite to blow the whole party up at midnight. His mother, reading his note of farewell to her, sooner than expected, hurries to the bride's house. Her son sees her and takes steps to stop the coming explosion. The photography seemed a bit out of focus in some scenes; but in others it was perfect. The scenes are very interesting.

"CAMILLE" (Champion), June 10.—THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has already commented on this beautiful two reel feature picture of the well-known play by Dumas. Camille is played by Gertrude Shippen and Armand Duval by Irving Cummings. The way this picture is conducted, with its acting, its stage sets and its camera work, is very commendable indeed. We need add no further commendation at this time. It is a lovely picture. Surely here is a popular feature. Gertrude Shippen gives a wonderful sweetness and charm to this, probably the most romantically noble character in literature. Her work is this fine picture's chief grace.

INQUIRIES

R. B.—We do not recall the film you mention and do not know of any film for which the late Carrie Nation actually posed, though she may have done so. Perhaps some brother exhibitor will offer light on the subject.

M. T. S.—In writing photoplays there are many specific rules to follow. Give the details of the essential action and leave the rest to the director. Do not lay out the scenery. Indicate the sort of scene it is and mention essentials, but do not go into details as to where the chairs and tables stand and where the trees shall grow. You not only number the scenes consecutively, but you make certain that the scenes are in consecutive order. You cannot follow one thread of plot for a time and then go back and pick up the other line and follow it. A scene must be shown at the time it happens. There is no "and in the meantime" in photoplay. Write the recital of action without any dialogue at all. The Lubin Company will send you a form sheet if you will send them a stamped and self addressed return envelope, but the matter is more fully covered in "Technique of the Photoplay," to be had of our publishers at one dollar a copy.

H. K.—We do not know what Miss Ruth Roland's record is as a child actress. Your good authority errs in stating that Miss Bertram's illness was caused by exposure in making a desert picture. It was not wholly unconnected with her inability to stick in the saddle. Hal and Wallace Reid are brothers. We have no cast for the Essanay picture. In spite of your kind words we cannot give you the age and nationality of Miss Joyce. We do not know where she was born, and since you praise our courtesy you surely cannot expect that we will ask a lady her age.

H. C.—Owen Moore has made a few appearances with various companies, but not as a regular member of the companies. We think, however, that you are mistaken in placing him with Rex in a minor role. He is now leading man in the new Victor Company.

G. deV.—The last we heard of the Fox Company it had shut down until it disposed of the negatives on hand. They do not release direct, but sell their negatives to companies needing material, which is why you do not see their trade mark. Such a firm is in existence, but does not seem to be very active. Perhaps a letter now will result in the return of your script.

Cashed In.—This is the fourth letter of yours we have handled in a week. In one of these you seem to answer the first questions asked here, so why ask? Most picture players are engaged by verbal contract or letter. There is no fixed form of contract in use. No state demands a license fee for making photoplays within the boundaries of the domain.

T. de V. H.—We find Arthur Johnson cast for one Lubin release every week. If you do not get them in your territory it's because the exchange does not send them to your town. "The District Attorney" and "The District Attorney's Conscience," as well as "The Prosecuting Attorney," have been made within the past eighteen months. Those and similar titles have been used before then, but duplication of titles does not seem to bother the manufacturers as much as it should.

E. H.—Questions of age, marriage relations, complexion, and the color of the eyes are rigidly barred by this department. Sorry, but we have our troubles as it is.

H. K.—E. R. Phillips was Uncle Tom in the Vitagraph's release of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Sorry to have kept you waiting, but we had to ask the Vitagraph.

G. W.—George Brammell was the clerk and Herbert Prior the traveling man in Majestic's "The Silent Call."

Richard Roe—We do not keep a record of special releases. The third question is not in order.

M. J. C.—Warren J. Kerrigan was the Foreman in American's "The Tramp's Gratitude."

W. V. B.—The probable reason that you do not get your script back when you write and ask for it seems to be that the office force is too busy to hunt through several hundred scripts to locate yours. We fail to see that the company is discourteous in merely enclosing a printed rejection slip. It is all that courtesy demands. More than this is special favor.

K. W. C.—The Powers Company has not replied yet. The Eclair advises us that the young man recalled from the West in "The Chamber of Forgetfulness" was William Dunn, formerly of the Vitagraph. He has since left the Eclair.

G. B.—Hal and Wallace Reid are not now with the Reliance. It is understood that Hal Reid will make special releases.

Beth—We do not like your manuscript paper. It is too thin and will give the Editor trouble. Use at least a 15-pound paper. A 20-pound is better. To put it plainer a 500-sheet ream should weigh 5 pounds without the box. The sample you send is known as "onion skin," and is used only where a large number of carbon copies are to be made with one original, the thin paper permitting the force of the stroke to reach through several carbon and white sheets. It costs less to send out, but you waste more postage if what you send is not read, and this will not be read in most offices.

"LET NO MAN PUT ASUNDER" (Imp).

"Let No Man Put Asunder" not only tells a very human and very pathetic story, but raises a nice point in ethics and morals. How many men would voluntarily surrender the woman they loved and to whose hand they were entitled in favor of a man once proved not worthy of her and now leading a reformed life.

It is a nice problem for the casuists to solve.

A pretty woman with a drunkard husband leaves him and attracts the attention of another man. She secures a divorce from her husband, who later has reformed and has entered the employ of the very man who intends to wed the girl. When he discovers that his own employee is the divorced husband of the woman he loves, he stands aside on the ground, "Whom God Hath Joined Together Let No Man Put Asunder."

Scene from "Let No Man Put Asunder" (Imp).

The scenes of the play are placed in surroundings that harmonize well with the main theme.

King Baggot is the good man who gives up the woman, whose love he wins; W. R. Daly is the reformed workman and the part of the wife is played by Violet Horner. The two little favorite Imp juveniles, Joe Moore and Edith Haldiman, figure cleverly in the play.

It is a sympathetic story with a very nice conclusion and we think it will touch the hearts and sympathy of innumerable picture fans.

"TARGET PRACTICE OF ATLANTIC FLEET" (Edison).

One of the most interesting motion pictures of battleships in action has been produced by the Edison Company for release on June 19th. This picture was taken by special permission from the United States Navy Department, and three cameramen were assigned to several of the warships, obtaining views of the evolutions of ships in target practice, the working of the great guns, and the drills of sailors and marines. One courageous cameraman lashed his camera on top of a big gun-turret and caught the flight of the projectile, but he was mighty glad to get away from there, for the concussion of discharge of four guns in salvo was by no means pleasant. Other views show the target in tow and the columns of water which shoot into the air as the great projectiles strike. The nearness of the projectiles to the target, although fired at a distance of five miles, gave conclusive testimony to the accuracy of American gunnery. Altogether, the subject is one of absorbing interest.

NEW SELIG PHOTOGRAPHS.

The Selig Polyscope Company has prepared an unusually artistic set of photographs of popular Selig players. These are not reproductions, but are original, de luxe, contact prints made direct from artistic retouched negatives by Sykes, of Chicago, and Estep & Kirkpatrick, of Los Angeles.

STAGE KIDDIES IN REPUBLIC PICTURE.

One hundred and fifty stage children were pictured by the Republic Film Company on Saturday, May 25th, and incidently about one hundred big kiddies, their mothers and fathers, at a gigantic May day festival at Central Park, N. Y. The occasion was the completion of a REP production soon to be released and appropriately named "Queen of May."

Broadway between 45th and 46th Streets never saw such a band of happy youngsters as the crowd that filled the three large 5th Avenue stage coaches, nor heard such cheering and yelling as the caravan started, and, in spite of the efforts of the director and half a hundred volunteer assistants, it took some time to stage one of the important scenes.

Scene from "Queen of May" (Republic).

The coaches finally left for Central Park, and, after finishing the production the kiddies were filled with ice cream, candy, pasteurized milk, cakes and sandwiches. Here again the camera had splendid opportunity for a gorgeous setting during the crowning of the Queen of May, as the green in Central Park was filled with thousands of little ones not of the stage, but when they became aware that the "movies" were taking their pictures, immediately jumped for their May-poles and began the beloved May-pole dance, so dear to the heart of kiddom.

Although the intention of the Rep Company was to have only 150 stage children doing their well-trained Maypole dance in celebration of the crowning of their King and Queen, their majesties witnessed, and the camera caught, thousands of volunteer subjects, each prettier than the other, their faces wreathed in smiles, and it made many an old fellow wish he was a kid again to join in the frolic. No mishaps occurred and no kiddies were lost, to mar this beautiful event.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

MR. NICHOLAS POWER, whose name has been closely associated with improvement in projection machines and appliances almost since the inception of the business, has just perfected a truly remarkable invention. The device in question will undoubtedly be hailed with delight by operators, since it will do away with one of the most annoying things he has to contend with. It will down the bugaboo of loop-losing. The invention is a very simple attachment which automatically resets the lower loop, and the writer is prepared to say, after careful and exhaustive tests, that it will enable the operator to run almost any kind of film at all, which does not pull in two entirely. It will reset the lower loop perfectly a dozen times a minute, if necessary.

This invention will put a stop to the annoyance of trying to reset the lower loop without stopping the machine. Its greatest value, however, lies in the fact that it will enable the manufacturer to entirely enclose the mechanism, thus complying with one of the conditions demanded by the authorities. In the past the principal objection to complete enclosure has been that it was very difficult to get at the film to reset the lower loop while running the machine. The stopping of the machine is a very annoying thing to the manager, as well as to the operator, since very naturally the audience objects to the screen going dark right in the middle of what is perhaps the best scene of the whole show. Losing the lower loop is a thing which cannot be avoided, at least until such time as films are in perfect condition, and a more nearly automatic take-up tension regulator has been devised. Mr. Power has invented a large number of devices in connection with the Power's machine, which have proven of much value to the business. He has, however, done no one thing which is of greater value to the moving picture business than this, his latest effort.

Without going into minute detail as to its construction, I may say that it consists of a metal roller, which comes down in front (in front means on the lens side), of the lower, or take-up sprocket. The film passes under this roller, and up over the sprocket, so that the roller sets inside the lower loop. If the lower loop becomes too short, or is "lost," the tightening of the film between the lower and intermittent sprockets jerks this roller upward, and, by a very clever and very simple mechanical arrangement, the take-up and lower sprocket are instantly released, and cease to revolve during exactly one revolution of the lower sprocket driving gear, when it again re-engages. This means that during the interval in which the take-up and lower sprocket is stationary, the intermittent sprocket has fed down three inches of film, which is just right for the lower loop. The take-up and lower sprocket then automatically re-engage, and the film goes joyously on its way down into the lower magazine until the lower loop is again lost, when the operation is repeated and re-repeated as many times as the loop may be lost. We understand that the Power's Company has secured basic patterns on this device, and intends to hold it exclusively for use on the Power's machine. This is rather a matter for regret, since so valuable a thing, should be available to all manufacturers. I cannot blame the Power's Company for holding the invention for their own profit, but I certainly wish that all operators might have the privilege of adding this attachment to their machine, for it looks to me like the "real goods."

NOTICE, REPORT WANTED.—Will those who are using, or have used the Detroit 60 volt, bi-polar generator and kerosene engine outfit kindly advise the editor as to their experience with same?

FROM FAR OFF NEW ZEALAND.—Mr. Fred Foley, Christ Church, New Zealand, writes: "Enclosed find six shillings, six pence, English money, for a copy of the hand-book ('Operators' Bible'). From the references it receives, it must fill a long-felt want and I am anxious to see this much-asked-for book. When my subscription to the World runs out, keep sending it and drop a postal. I will promptly remit the annual subscription, and any amount due for over numbers. All the boys are delighted to read it, and when we are through with it here, it goes to a southern moving picture manager, who is a friend of mine. I have advised him to write for a year's supply, and believe he has done so. Personally, I am of the opinion that no picture man should be without the Moving Picture World, be he manager, operator or proprietor. It is relished out here in New Zealand.

"Perhaps you can enlighten me on the following subject: It is quite common to read in the Projection Department of an operator using 6½ and 7½-inch condensers. Why such large size lenses? Out here in New Zealand most of the shows use 4 inch front and back condensers, though some use 4½-inch, the latter being preferred by a few of our operators. I am using 4½ myself with a Gaumont Chrono, and must say that the picture is perfect. It is like a lantern slide. My projection lens is 3 inches and I have a 60-foot throw. Have my own light plant with a twin-cylinder engine, and direct coupled dynamo. Output is 60 amperes at 60 volts. The fuel is petrol. I don't see much about the Gaumont Bio in the World. In fact, I don't seem to remember ever seeing it in the Projection Department. We, therefore, presume it is not much used in America. I believe if it was there would be less trouble. Would like to hear about operators who use the latest Gaumont. I bet they don't have troubles. I will now close, with best wishes for your newsy weekly, from a far-away reader, and a keen supporter of only the best in Bio machines."

This letter gives some idea of the circulation of the Moving Picture World. As a matter of fact, you boys who write letters to the department, are really speaking to operators, managers and proprietors all over the civilized world. The words I write in this department, from week to week, are read in Australia, New Zealand, Africa, the various countries of Europe (though to a limited extent, since the language in most instances is different), Cuba, South America, Mexico, in the 10,000 theaters in this country, and even in far-off China; so that you will see that it behooves one to be a little careful what one says, when speaking to so enormous an audience. As regards the lenses, the New Zealand brother has fallen in error, due probably to the difference in terms employed in the United States and in New Zealand. The term 6½ and 7½ does not refer to diameter, but to the focal length of the lens, which same the brother will find described on pages 67 and 68 of the hand-book. I may say that in this country the 4½-inch plano convex condensing lens is in almost universal use. The Gaumont projector has had but very little sale in this country. The beater type of machine has never made progress in America, and I very much doubt if it ever will. It is quite true that the use of a beater machine would eliminate certain troubles we have. It is also quite true that certain other troubles would spring up in their place and—there you are. We shall be pleased to hear from New Zealand often and to have more detailed information as to moving picture affairs out there. What are your admission prices? What is the average seating capacity? Are United States films popular?

FLY-WHEEL BELTING.—Fort Smith, Ark., writes as follows: "I want to warn the brothers not to belt a motor to the fly-wheel of their machine. Particularly does this apply to the Powers Six machine, since with that mechanism belting to the fly-wheel will ruin the toggle gear in six weeks time. Anyhow, no matter what make of machine you use, it will be better not to belt to the fly-wheel. We used the fly-wheel drive for a time, and but for the fact that we had a new part on hand, would have been compelled to shut down."

I thoroughly agree with you, Fort Smith, that belting from the fly-wheel is bad, as I have time and again set forth. Although it may be tolerated with the Edison or the Motiograph machines, where the fly-wheel sets between two bearings, still it is bad practice. I have said before, and again repeat that the belting should be done from some other point, or else by means of an especial motor drive prepared by the machine manufacturer.

CONDENSER LENSES.—Texas (name of town suppressed) writes: "What size condensing lenses are required for an Edison Type B square condenser holder? We use 110 volt, D. C., 30 to 35 amperes at the arc. Project an 18-foot picture, 89 feet. I have to locate the arc right up almost against the condenser in order to get a clear screen, and have to trim the carbons after every reel to keep them near enough to the lens. I don't know how to measure size of lenses, or would send you the focal length of those I am using. Am ordering a hand-book, which I expect will help me out in that respect. Do you think that the Mirroroide, or similar screens, give better results than the plain white screen? Would a ⅝ cored carbon above and ½-inch solid below give better results than using ⅝ cored carbons above and below?"

In the first place, Texas, the make of machine, or kind of condenser mount, has nothing whatever to do with focal length of condensers. Surely you don't read the department very closely, or don't keep the papers on file, for I have time and again explained the matter of focal length and its bearing on projection. On pages 67 and 68, you will find the method of measuring a projection lens to find its focal length. If you have an 18-foot picture at 89 feet, first take 15-16 of 89. Divide that by 18, and the result will be the equivalent focus of your projection lens in inches. In this case, it is about 4½-inch equivalent focus lens, and for this you may find that either a combination of one 6½ and one 7½, with the 7½ in front, or two 7½ lenses will give the best results. Try them both, and see which is the better. The directions for measuring condensing lenses, as given on page 67 of the hand-book, were the best to be had at the time it was written. The direction is, however, not entirely correct. Measure the lenses, as shown in the illustration, then turn them around with the convex side toward the wall, and measure again in the same way. The shorter measurement, plus ½ the difference between the two, will be the true focal length of the lens, as nearly as it can be ascertained by this kind of a rough measurement. Evidently, your condensing lenses are of too short focal length. I presume you have two 6½s in use. Yes, I personally prefer a ½-inch carbon solid below, but do not attempt to use the kind that electric light companies use in their lamps, as they are too hard. You must get the regular projection carbons in order to get the right results. I like the ½-inch carbon better for several reasons, one of which is that its tip is smaller than that of the ⅝ carbon, hence there is less likelihood of a shadow from the tip of the lower carbon being thrown on the screen in the form of a ghost. As to the Mirroroide and other similar screens, I don't care to comment on their relative merits.

RUNNING BACKWARDS.—Mr. Percy L. Jones, Milwaukee, Wis., writes at some length in an endeavor to convince us of our error in telling La Crosse that he could not run a film in his machine backwards, also asks us to make a practical experiment and be convinced.

As Milwaukee will see by last week's paper we have already admitted our error and apologized.

REFLECTING SCREENS.—New York City writes, setting forth at length, a proposition which is well worthy of considerable attention. Without going deeply into the matter, he claims that a reflecting screen is not effective in a theater in which the machine is located high above the curtain. He says that one reason for this lies in the fact that it reflects all stray light (presumably meaning rays from the house lights); he also says that a more serious reason is discovered when one considers that the angle at which the light from the arc is reflected is not toward the audience, but towards the apron of the stage; hence the piano player or orchestra gets the full benefit, while to the audience the picture appears dark. He proceeds to say that a reflecting screen reflects the light at a direct, given angle, whereas the non-reflecting type of screen gives back the light in a diffused form. He then asks two questions, viz: (a) "Are there any ocean liners or steamers using moving pictures for entertainment?" (b) "Since there has been so much tangle about the names of 'operating room,' 'booth,' 'coop,' etc., why not adopt the universal term which is both short and appropriate? Allow me to suggest the name 'cab.' This is appropriate because a locomotive cab has lookout windows and is controlled and operated inside. Another railroad term is 'caboose.' "

I have published the comments on reflecting screens because they appear to be pertinent and of value. If the deductions are not correct, then let them be disproved. We must say, however, that what the brother says appears to be approximately correct. I leave the matter to the discussion of our readers with the caution that no specific curtain shall be named, merely considering the matter as regards the reflecting type of screen. To this certainly no one can object. It is a legitimate discussion, which properly should be taken up in this department. It is a law of optics that the angle of reflection must equal the angle of incidence, but it must be remembered that this may be qualified by matte surface, which breaks up the angle of reflection; also the angle of incidence would have to be very heavy indeed to bring about the effect described. I might add that I believe the old type of perfectly smooth metallic screen has practically been abandoned; largely, I presume, by reason of the very point raised by the brother. As to your questions: (a) I believe there is no regular service on board any trans-Atlantic liner. Pathe tried something of the kind, I think, on a French ship, at one time, but it was not kept up. The reasons for this are several: In the first place, while it might work all right in a smooth voyage, when old Daddy Neptune stands up on his hind legs and gets busy wolloping the boat around, that is something else again. Passengers are too sick then to care anything about moving pictures, or anything else except figuring how quickly their misery will end by death or otherwise. Another reason is that in most boats, in fact I may say in all boats, except possibly the Lusitania and other enormous passenger ships, the cabin ceilings are too low to allow a picture of any good size to be shown. Again, the films would have to be kept out of service, or rather devoted to that one particular thing for a matter of at least two weeks, during which time, they could not be shown more than at the most probably three days. In fact, there are a great many things against such a proposition. However, Uncle Sam has a great many moving picture machines on board his men-of-war, where moving pictures are shown for the edification of the sailors—that is to say, if the term sailor can be applied to a man on board a modern battleship. (b) I see no reason for using "cab" or "caboose," in preference to the term "operating room." A cab conveys the idea of smallness—that very thing I am trying to get away from. Operators who use the term "coop," "box," etc., simply are assisting in retaining the little 4 x 6 operating room. The term operating room conveys the idea of a ROOM and not a "cab," "coop," or a "box," and there is a certain psychological effect in the words. I am endeavoring to, and am succeeding to an extent in making the term operating room universal in this country. It takes time to do a thing of this kind, after men have become accustomed to the use of other terms; but we are going to get away from the operating "coop" and "booth," both by name and in effect.

FLY-WHEEL DRIVE.—Moline, Ill., contributes the following: "I have noticed in several issues of the department that you condemn the fly-wheel drive. The fly-wheel drive may be bad, I do not know. However, I am using a 1912 Model Motiograph, with outside shutter and a special motor drive. I have a Kimble variable speed motor. The current is 60 cycle, 110 volt. The motor is ⅛ horsepower and is supposed to be hitched to the special motor drive. I tried this out however, and discarded it for the following reasons: The pulley on the drive was 2½ inches in diameter and the pulley on the motor was 1¾. When I would start a reel, the motor would run too fast, but toward the end of the show, when the take-up reel got full, it would slow down; also there was a lot of lost motion in the star and cam, which I was obliged to adjust about once a week. I was not satisfied with the results, so this is what I did: I turned a groove in the fly-wheel, which is now 2¾ inches, and got a 1⅛-inch pulley for a round belt. This has done away with about 80 per cent. of the lost motion in the shutter, and the star and cam remains tight; also the machine runs one speed all the time. Now, why is it the machine runs good from the fly-wheel and not from the special motor drive? All the boys in local No. 85 are after good results and they are getting them, too. The scale is fair in this neck of the woods, but nothing to brag of."

What in the world belting from a motor to the special motor drive of a Motiograph machine would have to do with lost motion in the shutter, and between the star and cam, is something you will have to ask somebody that is wiser than I. Also I don't understand what you mean when you say you "grooved the fly-wheel, which is now 2¾ inches, and got a 1⅛-inch pulley for a round belt." The only thing I can get out of that is that the latter pulley was placed on the motor. The fly-wheel of the Motiograph I have is three inches in diameter, so I suppose you mean that the wheel is now 2¾ inches in diameter at the bottom of the groove you turned in it. You apparently are running without any speed regulation. If this is so, your practice is not good, since you should change speed according to the action of the film.

THE ISOLATED PLANT.—Mr. H. G. Spraker, manager Amusement Co., Rich Hill, Mo., writes as follows: "You will perhaps remember me as the one who stirred up so much discussion concerning 'isolated light plants.' I am now ready to make my report. But first, I want to stick up for the brother who said he ran his machine backward, making the picture on the screen back up. You editorially gave him a 'trimming.' Now, Brother Richardson, you just dig around in your memory, and you will probably recollect that the Enterprise Optical Company used to put out Motiographs, and also those toys they called Optographs with a belt to the upper reel. There was a clutch in the pulley on the upper reel so that when the crank was turned backward, the film would rewind into the upper magazine. The machine was thus arranged so that the film could be rewound by running the machine in the opposite direction. The intermittent sprocket in those old mechanisms was closer to the tension springs than in the machines we are now using. This latter may have helped toward making it possible to run the film back up through the machine. But whatever the reason, I know that it could be done, for I did it myself with the Optograph, and saw it repeatedly done with the Motiograph.

"Now for the light plant report: We installed one of the Brush Direct Connected Lighting Sets in our new theater, the same having a 60-volt D. C. generator. On gasoline it works fine, but on the natural gas we have here it's a delusion and a snare. The 60-volt current is entirely satisfactory. I italicize for the benefit of those who said 60 volt was impossible. I have a Powers adjustable 35 ampere grid rheostat, and get 35 amperes by putting in a jumper, so that I use what is equivalent to about one whole grid. I have in three of these jumpers, and as I have them arranged so that I get four different current strengths with the adjusting lever. Have no trouble whatever in getting good light, and I also run the front lights, house lights, and fans off the same generator. We bought 60 volt fans and lamps from the Wesco Supply Co., of St. Louis. The Western Electric Co. also quoted me prices on 60 volt lights. Robbins and Myers, Springfield, O., quoted me prices on fans. In fact, I had no great amount of trouble in finding anything I wanted in 60-volt supplies. I would like to make a suggestion to the man who wrote such an enthusiastic recommendation of the Brush outfit after reading their catalogue. He told how satisfactory these machines are, and gave as his reason for saying so that he 'had read the catalogue.' I would call his attention to the fact that there are hundreds of gasoline engine catalogues, in which the publishers enthusiastically claim their engines to be the best ever. And yet you know, and I know, that there are lots of them not worth drayage from the freight house. This being the case, I think, catalogue recommendation is rather risky, to say the least. The Brush catalogue speaks of the wonderful regulation that their throttling governor gives. My experience is that it is fine on steady load, but not nearly as good as they claim from load to no load. I have a scheme for threading in frame, which I append hereto. If you think anything I have written is of any value, all right; if not, the waste basket is probably not full and can hold it. I want to thank you sincerely for the great amount of benefit I have received through the department in the past, and I confidently expect to get lots more."

Letters such as yours do not reach the waste basket, Friend Spraker; not by a jug full. It is such reports as these we want—practical reports from practical men. There are hundreds of managers all over the country, who are paying exorbitant light bills, and who contemplate the installation of an isolated light plant, and anything which throws added light on the practicability of such outfits is of great value to them. I think you must be mistaken about the brother recommending the Brush outfit after reading the catalogue. At least I didn't understand it that way, or the letter certainly would not have received space. I thoroughly agree with you. Catalogues are written by men who have goods to sell, and I have seen statements contained in some of them which would have made old Ananias hang his head for shame to think what an amateur he was in the art of prevarication. In this department we seek the truth and nothing but the truth, and we come just as near telling it as we can. I am particularly pleased with the endorsement of the 60 volt proposition, as I have all along contended that 60 or 70 volt current was entirely practical for theater work, though I have rather favored the 70 volt proposition. If the lower pressure works all right, then so much the better. We shall be glad indeed to hear from you at any time, and we trust that your hope of continued benefit through the department will not be unfulfilled.

ACOUSTICS.—Mechanicsville, N. Y., contributes the following: "I am having an awful lot of trouble with my theater in regards to singing. It seems as though when the singer is in action, it echoes terribly. Will you please tell me what the trouble is, and how to overcome it?"

The trouble is due to the acoustics of your auditorium, and I could not offer you any advice without having a detailed description of the house, its size, its height of ceiling and the kind of finish; in fact, every bit of data concerning it. I might then be able to help you, though, I think in a case of this kind, you will do well to consult an architect.

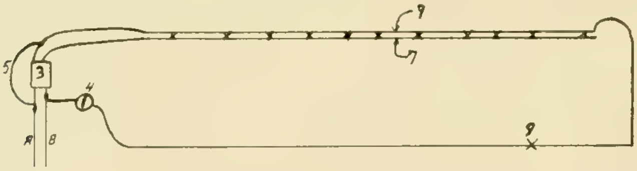
NOT OFFENDED.—New York City, writes: "I wish to thank you for supplying the addresses for which I asked (page 34, May 24th issue); but am sorry you were offended. You recently answered a question, through the department, concerning telegraphic companies which had nothing whatever to do with projection, yet you took no offense at the irrelevant question, and now, for the last time, I want to make one more query: Can a Powers Six machine be run with a motor? Has it to date been approved by the Underwriters?"

No, my brother, I did not get offended at the man who asked about the telegraph company; but if he had asked that question, and I went to the trouble of answering him, and then in two or three weeks he wrote again asking the same thing, saying he mislaid my answer, then I probably would have been offended. I am perfectly willing to answer any reasonable question, but it certainly is up to the one asking it to take care of the answer when given. As to the Powers Six; if you mean, as I suppose you do, to ask whether or not it has been approved for use for motor in New York City, I will say that no machine has been or will be thus approved. If the word of chief inspector counts for anything, each motor driven machine must be separately approved; that is to say, if you have a machine which you drive with a motor, and you get another, of the same kind, you will have to make application for a permit to drive that particular additional machine with a motor, and it will be approved or disapproved, according to the judgment of the authorities. For instance: If you have, let us say, a Standard which is motor driven, and you wish to install another Standard machine just like it, to be motor driven, you will have to make separate application for the second machine, which application will be considered entirely on its merits. So far as I know, there have been none of the old type Powers Six approved for motor drive, but I understand authorities will approve the new Six A type. However, bear in mind that a separate application must be made in every case and for every machine, unless two are installed at one time, in one place, in which case one application will cover both.

A NEW INVENTION.—Pa. (name of town suppressed) writes: "In following up the light effects of films, I have noticed, even on the best makes, a tendency to have both clear and dark positives on most reels. To remedy this, I have perfected an attachment whereby my arc, or crater, is intensified by a mechanical leverage, thus making the dark pictures clearer on the screen. The action is instantaneous and is performed without resistance of any kind. I further have perfect control over my amperage at all times, and with the use of my device I have been able to do away entirely with resistance of any kind in my lamp circuit, thus saving the loss in current, which has formerly been wasted in heat; at the same time retaining absolute control over the arc. The device is extremely simple, and easily attached, and could be sold at a good profit at $25. Now my reason for addressing you is to ask your advice. Since the device is thoroughly practical and does away with from 10 to 45 per cent. loss in current alone, would the demand for it justify my going to the expense of having it patented?"

I could not answer your question at all my brother, without first knowing what the device is, and how it operates. If what you say is true, and results equivalent to those now had can be secured by its use, without the waste encountered in resistance, then undoubtedly the thing would have a large value, and would be well worth patenting. But you will pardon me if I say that I lived for quite a time in the grand old State of Missouri, and I certainly would have to be "shown" on that kind of a proposition. It is possible, though highly improbable, that you can secure the results you claim. It is also quite possible that, even so, the device is impractical. That is all I could say without having a more explicit knowledge.

A QUEER PROPOSITION.—Edinburgh, Ind., proceeds to capture our goat thusly: "I received the hand-book O. K., and am well pleased with it. I would like some information as to the following diagram: In the sketch A B are the feed wires; 3 is a single throw, double pole knife switch; 4 is a single pole snap switch; 5 is a jumper wire around switch 3; 7-7 are number 14 weatherproof, wrapped with tape, making a cable out of the two wires and a cord between them. The crosses represent house lights, hitched between wires 7-7; 9 is the piano light. Now when I throw switch 3 in, leaving switch 4 closed all the time, light 9 goes out, and when I open switch 3, light 9 will burn. What is my trouble? I have tried a jumper wire on the positive, and it will not burn at all."



I wrote this brother telling him that he must have made some mistake in his diagram, but he replies saying that the diagram is absolutely correct. I can see no reason why switch 3 should have any effect on light 9, unless wire 9 is very small in size and of considerable length, thus developing abnormal resistance, and wires 7-7 are too small, thus very considerably reducing the voltage when house lights between the two wires 7-7 are switched in. This seems a rather improbable explanation. I say improbable for the reason that if that were the case, light 9 should burn dimly, whereas it goes out entirely. It must be that the wiring forms a jumper somewhere when switches 3 and 4 are closed. Probably at the upper right hand X. Have it tested.

FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA.—Mission City, B. C., encloses a check for a year's subscription and says: "Mr. Felix McManns, Chilliwack, B. C., did me a distinct favor when he recommended that I take the Moving Picture World. I am building an up-to-date theater to seat 232. Can you advise me which is the best system of lighting, machine and screen to use? I am a professional musician, and have as yet had no experience with moving pictures. We have 115 volt A. C. here. The building will be 30 x 75, the cost will be about $6,000 when complete. We have about 1,000 population. I shall install two manual and pedal reed organs, Estey or Mason & Hamlin make. What is the best plan for a novice to follow to learn operating?"

The indirect house lighting system seems to be meeting with a great deal of favor. However, the writer personally prefers a cone system of lighting—that is to say, no side wall lights, but lights on the ceiling, set in deep metal cones, so that no direct rays can strike either the screen or the eyes of the audience. This, in my opinion, gives the best result, but it is not available in a regular theater auditorium, by reason of the extreme height of the ceiling. You will, however, find the indirect lighting system very satisfactory. Advice concerning the different makes of machines, etc., cannot be given in this department for very obvious reasons. As regards the matter of learning to be an operator, I hardly know what to say. The only right way is to serve an apprenticeship under a competent operator, which I suppose you cannot do, situated as you are. With only 1,000 population to draw from you cannot possibly employ a competent operator. The only advice I can offer is to observe closely and study hard. Get the hand-book, watch the department, and let no opportunity slip to learn.

SALT BRINE.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) contributes the following: "I tried that salt soaking process and it works fine. Can get as good a light on 40 amperes as I did before on 60. I soaked my carbons 14 days in salt water, strong enough to bear up an egg, good and strong. I then laid them in the sun and left them for three days in the open air. I lay all I can pile on top of my condenser mount on the lamphouse, and always keep some baking thus four or five hours ahead. They are by this means thoroughly dry when I use them, and I am well pleased with results. I have been operating for four years, and have learned many good things from the department. I think the Moving Picture World is the best magazine printed for anybody in any way connected with the moving picture business. I find that if one can keep his lamphouse open at the top and back (Back is sufficient,—Ed.), and give the condensers a little play, they will not crack; but as soon as the lamphouse is closed up—bing! goes a lens. I see you say the Powers Six has a special motor attachment. Could you tell me the price of it and where it is designed it shall be attached to the machine? I am running with a motor and am belting from the fly-wheel, but don't like it as there is enough wear on that bearing without the added pull of the motor belt. Am using 220 volt, 60 cycle current from a three-wire system. The meter has only 40 amperes capacity, and sometimes on a dark picture I use 60 amperes. Would this overloading on the meter make any difference in the light bill? I have taken up considerable of your time, but the department has done so much good for me, that I felt I must write and let you know. I forgot to say that in using soaked carbons one can get better results by having the carbons hot when you put them in the lamp. Keep them hot by laying them on the top of the condenser mount."

We are, of course, more than pleased to know that you find the department and the paper to be of such value. Your testimony as to the salt brine stunt, simply backs up that of several other correspondents; but it seems that the brine must be made very strong, and the carbon be allowed to soak for about two weeks. The Powers 6 motor drive attachment is bolted to the machine base just under the big idler gear on the left-hand side, with which it meshes. You will see two holes in the side base at that point, and two on top of the base, unless your machine is a rather old one. These holes are to bolt on the motor attachment. The price of the same you can ascertain by writing the Nicholas Power Co., No. 90 Gold Street, New York City. I could not give you an intelligent answer about the meter without knowing whether you use a transformer, or a rheostat. By transformer, I mean inductor, economizer, etc. If you use a transformer, then your meter would not be overloaded when using 60 amperes at the arc, since you would be taking very much less than 40 amperes from the line. If you are using a rheostat, however, your meter would be overloaded, and probably would not register the total amount of current used.

COLORED LAMPS.—Ohio (name of town suppressed) writes: "Can you tell me how to color incandescent lamps? Can a three-wing shutter be put on an old model Edison one-pin machine, and will it be better than the two-wing; the three-wing to be an outside shutter? The people owning the opposition house here project their picture 100 feet, while my own throw is only 60. Both project an 8½-foot picture. My picture is very much brighter than theirs, and they say it is because they have the longest throw, which I consider as a joke."

The length of the throw of the opposition house has little or nothing to do with the brilliancy of their picture. On so small a picture there would be very little difference in effect, anyway, between the 60 and 100-foot throw, since both lenses are of long focal length. If you were projecting a larger picture, say 15 feet, then the picture at 100 feet should be the best of the two. The best scheme for coloring globes is to write the Chicago Stage Lighting Co., La Salle Street, opposite City Hall, Chicago, Ill., who can supply you with coloring fluid which is waterproof and is excellent in every way. You simply dip the globe in the fluid. As regards the three-wing shutter: It is quite possible to equip an Edison Exhibition Model (which I suppose is what you have), with a three-wing outside shutter. The method of doing this has been illustrated in the department once or twice, and if you look back through your old copies you will find it. A three-wing outside shutter, if properly designed, will give better results than the two-wing inside shutter; but the designing of the shutter is something you might have trouble with.

TROUBLE.—Maryland (name of town suppressed) writes: "This is the first time I have bothered you, but I must now ask you to solve the following problem: Not long ago, we installed a second machine, and got a different kind of current. Since that time, I have not been getting good results. We have two power houses here. Before we installed the second machine, we were using the trolley company's current, which is 110 volt, 60 cycle, A. C. From this I got a very good light. The manager, however, thought he would put in the city's current for the other machine, so that in case of emergency we would have two sources of supply. It is not giving satisfaction. Don't know what the trouble is. Have tried different condensers, and the carbons seem to burn all right. Have just put on new lugs, etc. The current is 110 volt, A. C., the same as the other. Have a helper who finishes one picture, while I get ready to start the other."

Inasmuch as you have not told me what the bad effect consists of, I am unable to make intelligent reply. You don't say whether you are using resistance, operating room transformers, or choke coils. You don't say whether the machine you installed is the same kind as the one you already had. You don't say whether the trouble consists in a diminution of curtain brilliancy, or ghost, or what. How, then, do you expect me to give you an intelligent reply? Operators in asking questions must remember that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to correctly diagnose a case, when one is anywhere from 10 to 10,000 miles away, even when all available information is given. Therefore when, as in the present case, practically no information at all is sent, then the problem becomes impossible of solution. If Maryland will come across with detailed information, I will be glad to do anything possible to help him.

UNDERSTANDS IT.—Manitoba, Canada (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "My assistant received your hand-book and is very much tickled with it. 'Gee,' he said, 'this is something you can understand.' Concerning La Crosse's letter about running the pictures backward, I was in London, England, about two years ago, and one of our features was to run the last picture, a comedy, backwards, turning the top reel by hand with belt off the take-up. We asked the audience, through the medium of a slide, to show their appreciation of this particular effort. We were using a 1908 or 1909 model machine. We are using two Powers Six here now, and are much pleased with them. Here is an odd thing: When the shutter is in position for best results, that is to say, no travel ghost, the film has made its complete movement with the lens open. By this I mean that while the intermittent is moving the shutter does not cover the lens. But when the blade does cover the lens, the film is stationary. This phenomenon is caused by the screen being away below the level of the machine. At least this is my idea of it. Am I right? As regards Millidgeville's trouble over his Powers Six grinding, I have the same difficulty, and have put it down to the toggle gear wearing, and have ordered a new one. The I. A. T. S. E. have a branch here, of which I am a member. There are only three operators in this city who are members. The city will shortly license operators, and I imagine a few of the theaters in this town will be looking for qualified operators, as there are an awful lot of crank turners here. I run a slide before each show, stating that the machine is in charge of the I. A. T. S. E. man, and it gets applause every time. There are 20 moving picture houses in this city, and of the whole lot, we are considered the best. We don't see many letters from the department from Canadian operators, therefore this long one is to make up for lost space."

Yes, that is the secret of the success of the hand-book. It is something the average operator can understand, whereas most of the works on electricity, optics, etc., are something that the average man can do almost anything else but understand. As regards that shutter matter, I think you are mistaken. The error into which you have fallen is doubtless due to the fact that there is sufficient lost motion in the gears to allow the lens to be uncovered, when you try it with the machine standing still. When the machine is running, you would, however, could you see it, find that the lens is covered when the film is in motion. The pitch at which the machine sets, or in other words, the drop in the projection, has nothing whatever to do with the matter. Yes, you were wise in ordering a new toggle gear; in fact, it would be a fine thing to keep a toggle gear on hand. They don't cost much, and the spare gear might save a lot of trouble. How does it come there are not more of your men organized? To answer my own question, though, I presume it is due to the very thing you have mentioned, viz: Incompetency. Yes, Canada has been a little lacking in the matter of correspondence of late. However, I did have a number of letters from the Land of the North some time ago. We will be glad to hear from the Canadian brothers whenever the spirit moves them.

CLOSE AT NOON.—The Nicholas Power Company sends in the following request: "Will you kindly announce through the columns of your department that as the Nicholas Power Company is running a union shop, under union rules and the shop closes at 12 o'clock noon every Saturday the year round. During the months of June, July and August, the office will also close at noon on Saturdays. We wish this announcement made so that our friends and customers will not send in telegraphic orders expecting them to be filled and shipped Saturday afternoon, which cannot possibly be done. Thanking you for this courtesy, we are, very truly yours,

"NICHOLAS POWER COMPANY,
Per J. G. G. Ross, Asst. General Manager."

The above is self explanatory and needs no comment. Our readers will take note that goods cannot be shipped Saturday afternoon and govern themselves accordingly.

SAN FRANCISCO HANDS US A WALLOP.—Brother W. G. Woods, President Local 162, Moving Picture Machine Operators of San Francisco, also president of the Theatrical Federation of San Francisco, writes: "I have been much interested in the articles which have appeared in the department regarding the six months' clause in the I. A. T. S. E. by-laws, and I am of the opinion that anyone, Brother Richardson included, who thinks it is practicable to assist the isolated operator by throwing down the bars that protect those who by their efforts have improved conditions in the larger cities, should be condemned to some punishment which will fit the crime, such as being elected business agent of a prosperous local in a large city, I feel quite sure that after serving his time his utopian propaganda would have been so badly kicked around that he would be willing, if not glad to confine his attention to retaining what had already been secured for his own men, rather than to expose them to the inevitable dissolution that would take place should these protective restrictions be thrown to the winds, and the organized men be forced to compete with the flood of men from the outlying towns, most of whom have no idea of unionism, or what it stands for, which would pour in on them as a result. Let us take, as an example, a case where it appears that a certain operator has by his efforts outgrown his job, and is in search of better conditions, which he can only find in the larger cities. Granting he is competent to pass a reasonable examination, he comes to the city, applies, passes that examination, is accepted, and takes his place with the others already there around the office, hoping some one will die or get sick so there will be a vacancy. Meanwhile the place he left in the outlying town is filled by some other member of the local he just joined—Hey, stop! Nothing like that occurs! The place he left is filled by Jimmie, the door boy, who has turned the crank and fed the lamp on Sundays when the operator went to supper, and is one of those progressive boys who will take a chance on anything, once. Of course, Jimmie doesn't get the salary, as he is new at the business, but the operator has left the machines in good condition so he gets by, and starts to figuring how soon he can also get to the city and see the white lights—meanwhile getting Tommy, the usher, broke in so he can be ready to take his place when he, in turn, leaves.

"And there lies the kernel in this particularly hard-nut-to-crack. The isolated operator multiplies faster than he can be taken care of by the organized operator. Multiply this by the number of isolated operators anxious to get ahead in the game, divide it by the number of locals where good conditions have been secured by years of hard work, and ask yourself the answer, which the enthusiast condemned to serve as business agent will, I believe, find to be about as follows: Presuming the city to be thoroughly unionized, there are only so many jobs, and there is a man on each one, with some left over, therefore the new recruit is forced to join the ranks of the unemployed, with the added disadvantage of lack of acquaintance with either the people in the business, or the local conditions governing it, while the condemned one, in his capacity of business agent, although he wants to see all the operators united in one compact body, as it has been set forth, is unable to unite this man to a job, for the simple reason that there is no job not already filled. The new recruit, or probably recruits, are then placed in a position which is apt to be extremely difficult for the man new in union matters, viz: that of maintaining union conditions and waiting for his turn for a position secured through the business agent, the only alternative being to seek a place for himself. If he is loyal and chooses the former course, he finds he is worse off than before he joined the union, by reason of the constant flow of men to the larger cities keeping the ranks not only full, but over-flowing. If, on the other hand, he seeks to find his own job, he discovers that he can readily secure one at a price; but the price is that of his honor among men. The securing of a position is always easy to him who will help tear down what others have reared in their attempts to help all, but the step once taken cannot easily be retraced, by reason of the fact that the union, to whom he has once proven traitor, fears that those who degraded him once, will be able to do it again, should he again be placed in a similar position. Again, many unions have an apprentice system whereby apprentices are obliged to put in a certain time as a helper, after which they become full members. In these cases the condemned one, acting as business agent, would encounter a strenuous and very just protest from these same apprentices against the placing over them of men who had not subscribed to union conditions, and proven their ability, honesty and reliability even as long as they themselves had, and whom they would in many cases be obliged to instruct in their duties; for it must be conceded that an apprentice on a certain job knows more about that particular job than any new operator, particularly one who comes from an isolated town where possibly the job was just what he made it, with few definite lines to follow. The operator who started this discussion says 'I am not going into any of these towns looking for work, I have a good job'; at which one wonders why he is so anxious to join the I. A. T. S. E. and pay for something which can do him presumably no good in his present position, until, reading further, he says, 'I am making good money but I am not getting a fair show in this little burg and want a chance to get out and reap the benefit, etc., etc.,' and says, further, 'I have been offered a position on the road at $35.00 per week, provided I have a card,' but he forgets to mention the man who had this job, and who possibly had worked years to protect the I. A. T. S. E. card and make the job pay $35.00, instead of a smaller sum, as it would if the card was not a necessity. Bro. Richardson builds up a beautiful edifice around the stock argument that it is a man's privilege to go anywhere he pleases, when he pleases, and earn his bread in his chosen profession, citing other crafts widely dissimilar as examples, and then in the manner of all arguments where the trade union is involved, proceeds to tumble it all down again with the qualifying remarks, 'Provided he does not undermine his brother by unfair competition,' and, 'It must not be expected he can go to a strange town, join the union and displace a home man, but that matter is easy of regulation by local law, thus admitting regulation to be necessary. Now regulation is necessary, why not by international law, which makes it the same for all locals, instead of by local regulation, which will be different and conflicting in different locals? The I. A. T. S. E. laws are very reasonable in the matter of charters, and thousands of operators could be benefited by getting together and pulling their own wagon out of the mud, instead of complaining that they are not permitted to ride on the wagon pulled by those who have taken advantage of these laws, and have, by their united efforts, made the wagon easier to pull. Any seven or more operators or stage hands, or both together, can for the sum of $25.00 secure a charter from the I. A. T. S. E., seating them in any central labor body of the A. F. of L., and these may be in two or more adjacent towns, or in the whole county in some instances, where the men are scattered. Their cards are good on the road after reasonable length of membership, and are good to work in any other city under the jurisdiction of any other local—if there is work—and if our condemned friend, the business agent, cannot find it for them, how are they to find it with or without a card—at union conditions? Operators without a card are granted permits, provided the need of men exists, until such time as it can be shown they are eligible, and desirable as members, and I believe under these conditions many locals could be organized if the operators will help themselves, instead of complaining that others are more fortunate. As for the completely isolated operator where no local could be formed, his ambition to rise in the business is as laudable as is mine to become a great theatrical magnate, with automobile and steam yacht trimmings; but as I cannot at present break into that union, owing to existing restrictions greater than a six months' residence, I fear I shall have to jog along with what I have, unless that great time shall come when there shall be no rich, nor yet any poor, but each shall receive as his part the full value of that which he produces.

"I cannot close without taking Bro. Richardson to task for the statement in the May 18th WORLD that the last I. A. T. S. E. convention passed no laws of especial value to the operator, for, thanks to the operator delegates, and to the many friends of the operator among the stage hand delegates, there was much good legislation passed in behalf of the operator, of which I cite but one case, viz.; 'The distinct moving picture and projecting machine operators' unions of the I. A. T. S. E. shall have full control over all operating rooms in all theaters and places of amusement,' which settled the question of the several stage hands locals, who claimed jurisdiction over the operating room in vaudeville theaters, conceding to the operator locals the nickelodeon only. All disputes on these lines were decided in favor of the operators. Other legislation equally good from the viewpoint of the operator was passed and I am therefore obliged to believe Bro. Richardson has not informed himself in the matter, as he is able to do, being entitled to a copy of the proceedings as well as the international laws by virtue of his membership in the I. A.

"There is no doubt that much more could be done for the operator at the coming convention, and which doubtless will be done; notably the placing of organizers in the field, as the opportunity to organize several thousand men of their own craft is one that would be quickly seized by most any international, and should be taken advantage of by the I. A. T. S. E. which is, however, handicapped by lack of funds, the international per capita tax, unlike other internationals being very small. In the considerable organization work I have done I have found the I. A. officials ever willing and eager to assist, and I personally know that Secretary Hart has gone through many trials and troubles to help the operator, and has been at all times ready to smooth the way, provided they will help themselves. Local 162, of San Francisco, will send not one, but two delegates to the coming convention, Brother L. G. Dolliver and myself having been selected for that honor, and while we shall be in favor of any law, or laws, which will improve the conditions of the unorganized operator, and while we have already gone on record as favoring the placing of organizers in the field, we shall continue to demand protection for those who by their own efforts have bettered their condition, from the drifter and the tourist who is usually ready and willing to tear those conditions down."

We are more than glad to have the opinion of so able a man as President Woods, even though his views be, on some points, diametrically opposed to our own. We esteem it both a pleasure and an honor to call Brother Woods our personal friend; but friends may differ in views, and the friendship need not, and should not prevent each from expressing his own individual ideas. It must be conceded that President Woods has had a wide experience in union matters as applied to operators, and to a certain extent I am therefore obliged to defer to his views, though I cannot altogether agree with them. I fully realize and appreciate the difficulty under which he labors, as Union Business Agent in a city like San Francisco, which is the dumping ground of the entire western country. By "dumping ground" I mean it is the logical point toward which a large percentage of those thousands of men who travel about the country, subsisting on it during their passage, gravitate. Beyond question this class contains a number of operators, and a very large number of would-be operators, and it is no joke to President Woods and the men of No. 162, as I can very well understand. I regard Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, Tacoma, and Los Angeles, particularly Frisco, Los Angeles, and Denver, as occupying rather a unique position in this respect. They are, I believe, troubled to a greater extent with this proposition than are any other cities in the country.

But let me very briefly pay attention to Brother Woods' arguments. In the first place, I am unable to see that the fact that an operator who might come to the city was a union man would in any way alter things, except that I will agree that it would harrow up the feelings of the long-suffering Business Agent to have a lengthening list of out-of-a-job non-resident members. If the man came to the city without being unionized first, then certainly he would immediately proceed to "seek his own job," and probably seek it "at a price" too. Surely his union membership, even though recently acquired, would at least act to some extent as a deterrent in this respect. What Brother Woods says concerning the way operators (?) are made in small towns is amusing; also it is true. It sets forth actual conditions about as they are. I am accused of citing, for comparison, other widely dissimilar crafts, and setting forth utopian ideas. Well, I plead guilty to the latter charge and confess that I am a great believer in utopian ideas. I firmly believe that some day the time will come when the poor, whom "we have with us always," shall be no more, but we shall have the rich with us, for we shall all be rich in contentment and plentifully supplied with all that goes to make life pleasant and enjoyable. However, inasmuch as all this will come to pass long after both President Woods and the Editor have been gathered into Old Father Time's sheaf, it is idle to discuss it in these columns, even were it appropriate. I cannot agree that the other crafts cited are widely dissimilar, except that they are older and their organizations are better established. I see no dissimilarity in crafts of men who labor and earn their bread in the sweat of their brows, though certainly the circumstances surrounding each one presents radical differences. In this sense President Woods' criticism is correct.

I cannot agree with President Woods as regards the Brother who started the discussion. In fact he did not start it. I had already received many letters on the same subject, and had been getting ready to "land on it" for some time. The letter in question merely served to set me going, because it seemed a fairly typical case. Yes, Brother Woods, the I. A. T. S. E. card has been made valuable by the efforts of other men who have suffered, just as the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers' cards have been made valuable by those who suffered (and I was one of them too), but that is absolutely no reason why competent, capable men should be kept out of the organization It seems to me that President Woods overlooked the one vital point of my argument, viz.: competent men, C-O-M-P-E-T-E-N-T, mind you, I said. It is the competent man I am talking about, and President Woods knows as well as I do that if the examination is such as to admit only men who really can be termed competent, there is no danger whatever of flooding the market, even in San Francisco.

I would like very much to spend pages on this matter and go fully into it, but I simply cannot. I have robbed the Department of too much space already, crowding out other letters, and I must close.

As to the work of the last convention, I must maintain that very much more could have been accomplished had there been full, free discussion of what was needed before the convention, so that delegates could have gone there with intelligent ideas of what was needed, and what should be fought for—for one usually has to fight for what one gets in a convention. I have, within the two past weeks, received request from Boston asking that I do not discuss in the Department matters concerning the coming convention, giving a reason therefor. I deferred to the wish of Boston in this respect, though much against my own judgment, until the receipt of Brother Woods' letter. I asked for further information from Boston and it was not forthcoming. I do not feel that I am bound to lay down on the proposition unless Boston sets forth more detailed reasons than those contained in the first letter. The last convention did something for the operator—yes, but after all, Brother Woods, I know and you know that it was mighty little, everything considered. Granted that the International officers have been willing to do things for the operators. I was under the impression that that was exactly what they were there for, and that so long as the operators are held bound to the I. A. T. S. E. the International officers ought to do everything possible for them. If they have done that, well and good. It is to their credit. If they have not, that is something else again. Personally I believe the International officers have tried to do the right thing by the operators, as they saw it. But I am of the opinion that the operators ought to go into the convention fully prepared to secure every possible right to which the operator is entitled. I am also of the opinion that this can only be done by full and free discussion of the needs of the operator before the convention meets—carefully remembering that the needs of Boston, for instance, are not necessarily the needs of San Francisco, or the needs of San Francisco the needs of St. Louis. President Woods very kindly expressed a determination to come on to New York City to visit me, unless I can be present at the convention, therefore I expect to have the pleasure and the honor of entertaining Brother Woods and his colleague, Brother Dolliver, and of talking these matters over with them personally, either at the convention or at New York City; however, I am afraid it will be impossible for me to attend the convention.

One thing I would particularly call attention to, viz.: The San Francisco local is sending two of its leaders, both men of wide experience and of undoubted ability, almost 3,000 miles to the convention, at a very much larger expense than will probably be borne by any other union for such a purpose. Considering the distance and the enormous expense, it is surprising that San Francisco is sending two men, and it may be remarked that the men in the Golden Gate City usually do things right, or else they don't do them at all. Another thing upon which I would like to remark is that the operators should have representation in the roster of international officers, and while we have many able men, I know of none better fitted to fill such a position than W. G. Woods, president of the San Francisco local, and president of the San Francisco Theatrical Federation. President Woods is a man of great executive ability. He was a charter member of the old protective union of San Francisco, when it was the only one of its kind in the world eight years ago. He has been in the harness ever since. Both he and his colleague, Mr. L. G. Dolliver, are looking forward to the chance to do on a large scale what they have already done in a smaller way on the Pacific coast.

GOOD RESULTS FROM RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREENS.

Messrs. Bank & Ryan recently opened their new theater in Williamson, W. Va., which is called the Hippodrome, and which, for elaborate equipment and arrangement, is not surpassed in the entire State. The American Theater Curtain & Supply Co., of St. Louis, Mo., have supplied them with a No. 6 Powers and a Fort Wayne Compensarc, as well as one of their Radium Gold Fibre Screens. Messrs. Bank & Ryan are delighted with the results that they are obtaining from this projection equipment.

Messrs. Brentlinger and English, of the Orpheum Theater, Terre Haute, Ind., have recently installed a Radium Gold Fibre Screen. Mr. Robert T. Kane, general manager of the company, personally saw the installation. The purchasers are highly pleased with the very fine pictures that are now being shown, and are now contemplating equipping the rest of their theaters in a like manner.

New York State Exhibitors' Convention

OFFICIAL notice has been issued by President M. A. Neff of the MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA for a meeting of Motion Picture Theatre Managers of the State of New York, to be held at the Union Square Hotel, New York City

on Wednesday, June Nineteenth, 1912

for the purpose of organizing a State Branch of the Exhibitors' League for the State of New York and to select representatives to the National Convention at Chicago, Ill.

President Neff, of the National League, will be present to assist in the work of organization. Meetings will be held in the Assembly Room of the Union Square Hotel, Fourth Avenue and 15th Street, beginning at ten o'clock Wednesday Morning, June Nineteenth.

Every Motion Picture Exhibitor doing business in the State is cordially invited to be present and assist in the work.

The New York City Exhibitors' Association will provide a program of entertainment for the visiting Exhibitors that will insure a good time for all. There will be automobile sight-seeing tours of New York and tours of the nearby Summer Resorts with a banquet at the finish.

Give yourself a vacation and attend this convention. It will be an important meeting for Exhibitors interested in the improvement of the Motion Picture Theatre business, and you will get a little recreation as well.

REMEMBER THIS: The Business Meeting begins at ten o'clock, Wednesday Morning, June 19th.

Universal Issues Strong Program

HAS ELIMINATED ALL POLITICS AND WILL DEVOTE ITS ENERGIES TO THE PRODUCTION OF A DAILY FEATURE PROGRAM—SOME OF THE STARS.

THE plans of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., now being carried out, are directed toward the framing of a quality program, according to the Universal management. To a representative of this paper they outlined the aims of the company, as follows:

"The success of any program must necessarily depend upon the financial benefit it is to the exhibitor. It must not only be of quality, but it must be of sufficient quantity, and well balanced.

"The community of interests brought about by the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. eliminates at one swoop all personal barriers which have heretofore existed. It provides the means for perfect harmony in an organization whose sole aim is the production of high-class film.

"In order to have uniform quality of photography all the work of printing and developing has been concentrated in the best plants, such as Rex and Bison, which have been enlarged to meet the requirements. This will insure perfect photography for every release.

"The production department has been placed upon a most unique basis, which, we believe, overcomes all obstacles heretofore perplexing motion picture producers. A scenario department has been established, which will receive the manuscripts from the playwrights and give them careful consideration. Those selected will be well paid for, the minimum price being $25 for a single reel and $15 for a short, or half-reel photoplay.

"The selected scenarios will be distributed among the various directors, according to the nature of the subjects they have been assigned to produce.

"The interchanging of actors assures first-class dramatic work in the entire cast. Outside of the principals, or permanent members of a stock company, heretofore actors have been engaged as extras, but now these extras will be selected with great care and will receive permanent employment as regular members of the Universal Stock Company. The leading actors will thus be supported by excellent actors at all times.

Florence Lawrence.

Wm. Shay.

"In the West the Imp, Nestor and Bison companies have been practically consolidated, under the general management of Fred Balshofer. The already enormous personnel of the Bison Company has been enlarged and single reel subjects are being turned out. If the Imp or Nestor stock companies need some heavy scenes in a picture, with horses, soldiers, Indians, etc., they will draw on the Bison for them. In the same way, if the Bison Company should be in need of a certain type of actor which the Imp or Nestor companies have, he will be assigned to the Bison Company.

"The same arrangement will work in the East, where the stock companies have been considerably strengthened. The new Gem Company is all its name implies, producing meritorious subjects under the direction of George Nicholls, who has gained an enviable reputation as a producer of feature films.

"The Victor Company hardly needs any comment, as the work of Florence Lawrence, under the direction of Harry L. Solter, is well known throughout the world. Miss Lawrence has enjoyed a much needed vacation, and is back at work sparkling with vivacity and life, and exhibitors can confidently expect splendid pictures from this studio. Owen Moore, who has proven a popular favorite with the public, will play opposite Miss Lawrence, the two being supported by an all-star cast.

"The present program is composed of 24 reels, including two two-reel features. To this will be added two and three-reel features until there will be one released every day, and the program will consist of more than 36 reels.

Rex Company
Marion Leonard.

Jack Conway.

"The resumption of the Itala releases places a split-reel comedy at the disposal of exhibitors. The third Rex has been looked forward to for a long time, and the "101" Bison single reels have been clamored for since the beginning of the two-reel releases.

"Under previous systems an exhibitor did not know what kind of a program to expect, as each manufacturer was confined to the narrow limits of his own plant. A committee has been appointed by the Universal to balance the daily program, and instead of worrying about what kind of films he is going to get, the exhibitor can devote his time to improving his theater and properly advertising it.

"All politics have been eliminated from among the members of the Universal Company, and the energies of all its members are directed solely to the production of good film.

"The exclusive division of the territory, which has been harmoniously arranged between the various exchanges, will prove a great protection to the exhibitor. Too many times, as every exhibitor knows by bitter experience, a theater will advertise and feature the coming of a certain subject and then have his labors and expense taken advantage of by a near competitor who sneaks the film in a day or so ahead of the other man. Taking service from a Universal exchange will mean protection from these annoyances, and the exhibitor will know what he is going to get some time in advance, and he can depend upon getting it.

"Users of the Universal program can give to their patrons the best in dramatic art, including such popular players as Florence Lawrence, Owen Moore, Ethel Grandin, King Baggott, Phillips Smalley, Anna Little, Vivian Prescott, Fred Mace, Francis Ford, Marion Leonard, Margareta Fischer, Lois Weber, J. B. Sherry, Jack Conway, Fritzi Brunette, Wm. R. Daly, John Manley, Wm. Shay, Edward Lyons, John Cumpson, Edward Le Saint, Lillian Christy, David Wall, Harry Pollard, Grace Lewis, Lila Chester, Lillian Leach, Wm. Williams, Ethel Elder, Jefferson Osborne, Vivian Rich, Gertrude Claire, Earl Simmons, etc.

"The Universal has gone forward in the securing of competent help in all departments, and has engaged many actors, directors and camera men. Short scenic subjects of beauty will be attached to various releases, for which we find there is a certain demand among patrons of moving picture theaters.

"The two and three-reel feature releases should appeal to the owners of theaters, coming to him in his regular service, in a steady, continuous supply. The Itala, Ambrosio and Eclair companies are specializing in this direction, in addition to which we have added dramatic and sensational features. The first Gem release, for instance, is a beautifully costumed play entitled "Princess Lorraine.'

"The '101' Bisons have proved tremendous money-getters for the exhibitor, and it is well known that no expense has been spared in the production. "Custer's Last Fight," which is scheduled for release about June 30, is the last word in spectacularism and sensationalism, approximately two thousand people taking part.

"We are now taking a series of pictures which utilize battleships in action, having secured the co-operation of the government.

"Forty-nine exchanges are handling the Universal program, advantageously located. We believe we have put our business on a sound basis."

"NO CHILDREN WANTED" (Powers).

"No Children Wanted" is a story with both comedy and pathos—a rare combination in moving pictures. Hawkins, who is the father of nine small children, lands in the city and casts about for an apartment where he can domicile his family. He is quite unusued to city ways and applies at several apartment houses. He is dismayed when the landlords size up his little flock and make it emphatic that "No children are wanted." He is surprised, but persists only to be turned down in a curt manner. Night is approaching, and he wends his way to a park, followed by his family. They find refuge for the night on a park bench to awaken next morning to find themselves confronted by a sympathetic policeman. Hawkins tells him his story and is advised by the guardian of the public peace to "Smuggle" his children into some flat and trust to luck.

Hawkins acts on the suggestion and applies to a rather fussy landlord. He has no trouble in leasing a flat when he avers that he has no children. The moving in is done in an ingenious manner. Baskets, barrels, hampers, and last but by no means least, the refrigerator is moved in. When the landlord has retired the receptacles open as if by magic and the children bob up. A counting of noses discloses the fact that the baby has not been accounted for, and, after a search it is found in the ice box, and the family is complete.

The mother of the landlord is a confirmed invalid and is wheeled about in an invalid chair. She is left alone in a room, and a fire breaks out. The children of Hawkins go to the rescue and the volunteer juvenile fire brigade succeed in rescuing the invalid. The noise attracts the attention of the owner of the house, and he discovers the children. He is wrathy and serves notice on Hawkins to vacate, but learns that the little tots have saved his mother and he relents and tells Hawkins he may remain as long as he likes. The story closes with the family of Hawkins being entertained at dinner by the landlord.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

MAJESTIC STRONG ON SPLIT REEL SUBJECTS.

THE Majestic Motion Picture Company consider that they are fulfilling a want in the trade by supplying split reel subjects, principally comedies. They are perfectly right in their conclusions, for the split reel and the comedy are both held in very high esteem by any man who makes a business of exhibiting moving pictures. Since the Majestic has been under the general management of Mr. Roy Aitken, which is only four weeks, the policy of the company has changed from drama to the above-mentioned scheme of half-reel comedies. In the short space of a month the demand for Majestic pictures has been increased very much, owing to this change of policy.

The latest of the Majestic productions to come to our notice is a two-subject reel, having as its opening number a short detective story entitled "Room 257." This is followed by a lively farce-comedv. entitled "Shocking His Flock." "Room 257" tells a complete story of a hotel crime and its solution. The hotel crime is a brutal murder, but it does not appear on the screen. The murder really takes place in the imagination of the spectator, though it is, of course, superinduced by the auto-suggestion of the picture. The examination of the body when the coroner and police arrive is shown by suggestion in the cleverest possible manner. We see the men looking down at the body, but the picture does not show the men below their knees, consequently the body on the floor is not visible. The only way that the picture illustrates definitely that there is a dead man in the room is when one of the detectives reaches down and lifts up a hand and lets it drop again, after a brief examination.

Scene from "Room 257" (Majestic).

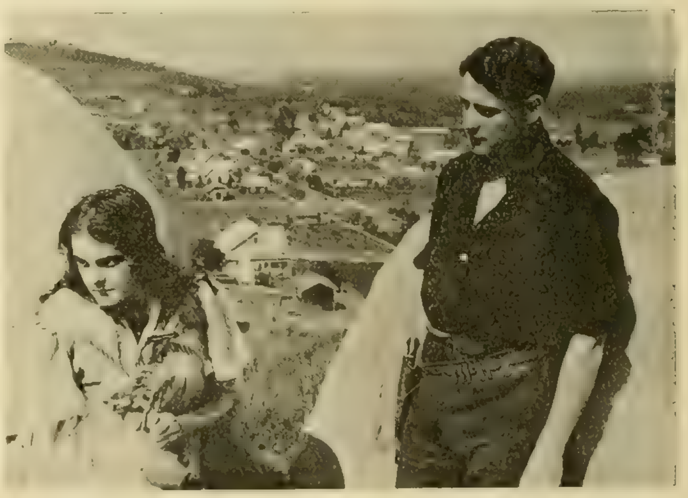
The opening scene shows a hotel office and a guest arriving. The man registers and is assigned to room 257. Standing in the hotel office is a young man who is apparently well-to-do and respectable. He seems to be acquainted with the cigar clerk, the hotel clerk, and the telephone girl. None of them pay any attention as he leaves the office shortly after the guest is shown to his room. This man is a thief, as we soon discover, when we see him making his entrance into room 257. While he is busy making a quick haul, the occupant surprises him; the thief draws his pistol and—we do not see him fire, but the subsequent scenes suggest that he did. The detectives and police are soon on the case, picking up the various clues. One of these clues is a half-smoked cigar; the band on it shows plainly that it was purchased in the hotel. There being no odor of tobacco on the dead man's hand, it is presumed that the man was murdered. The thief had not taken anything with him, as he wished it to appear that it was a case of suicide. One by one clues are picked up that fasten the crime quite positively upon the young man, who is still about the hotel taking things easily, and being far from general suspicion. His arrest takes place as the ending of a well conducted investigation.

On the same reel, "Shocking His Flock" is a hilarious comedy offering, built for laughing purposes only. It is enacted in one scene, which is a colored people's church. The parson has been having considerable trouble in keeping his parishoners awake during his sermons. He has also had as much trouble getting money out of them through the contribution box. The parson has a consultation with the deacon, and during their talk the deacon has an inspiration. The inspiration is that they get an electrician to wire the church so that all the seats may be charged with electricity when the parson pushes a button. They decide to kill two birds with one stone; that is, to wake them up and get them to contribute at one press of the button. Just before applying the shock to the sleeping congregation the parson calls out "All those who are willing to contribute a dollar this morning please rise." Then he presses the button. The results fulfill the wildest dreams of the parson and the deacon. It certainly is a good comedy.

"THE SIMPLE LOVE" (American).

In "The Simple Love," the American Film Manufacturing Company's release of Thursday, June 13, film renters will be treated to a combination of the mountain home with its simple life and the complex, cross currents of life in a big city dive.

The story centers about a young man, fresh from successful mining fields, who stops at a trapper's home in the fastness of the mountain. Here he meets a beautiful girl, primeval in instincts, untutored and guided entirely by her heart. Later the scenes change to the dens of a city where the mountain girl finds the miner debauching himself. She brings him to a realization of his folly and saves him from death at the hands of a denizen of the underworld. The picture is beautifully acted, the photography superb and the story a masterpiece of its kind.



Scene from "The Simple Love" (American).

"THE PASSER-BY" (Edison).

No more interesting comedy-drama or character portrayal has been produced in some months by any maker of motion pictures than the Edison subject "The Passer-By," which is to be released on June 21. In this subject, Marc MacDermott, already recognized as a master of the art of make-up, wins new laurels by his clever impersonation of the character assigned to him.

The story is that of a young man who is giving his last bachelor dinner to his chums, just prior to his marriage. The young man greets his guests as they arrive, showing them a portrait of his bride's mother which has just been presented to him and which hangs over the mantel near the head of the table. But just as the party is about to be seated around the festive board it is discovered that one is absent. That the chair may not be vacant, a suggestion that the first man who passes the door shall be drafted to fill the vacancy is adopted.

Presently the first passer-by is dragged reluctantly into the room, and despite his protests is compelled to take a seat at the head of the table. The dinner then proceeds. At the conclusion of the feast the stranger is called upon for a story. His appearance shows at a glance that he is one of the "down and outers," and the story he tells is that of his experience. And that experience is related in the succeeding scenes into which the picture dissolves. In those scenes the stranger appears at an early period of his life, seated at his own bachelor dinner, but just as he is about to address his guests a messenger boy arrives with a letter. Breaking the seal, he reads a message which proves to be the breaking of the engagement by his fiancee, and he steals quietly away, leaving his guests in confusion. From that time on he goes steadily down from a successful broker to a broken outcast. It is in the depiction of these successive stages of deterioration that the art of Mr. MacDermott is illustrated. The pathos of the story and the strange coincidence of fate is illustrated in the final scene, when the passer-by turns to the picture on the wall and recognizes therein the woman whom he was to have married and who is now the mother of the prospective bride. His story told, the passer-by leaves the scene of merriment and goes his way. One of the striking scenes of this picture is a view of the Stock Exchange, herewith reproduced. It is hard to believe that this scene was taken in the Edison studio and not actually upon the floor of the New York Stock Exchange.

THREE NESTOR WESTERNS.

A trio of tremendously good Western photoplays are being released this week by the Nestor Co. On Monday, June 10th, "The Belle of Bar Z Ranch," a cyclonic comedy, directed by Thomas Ricketts and splendidly portrayed by Vivian Rich, Harry Von Meter, and a host of efficient players, will make its initial bow.

"The Squatter's Child," an unusually strong and remarkably well acted drama, is scheduled for release Wednesday, June 12th. The director is Milton H. Fahrney and the leading roles are in the capable hands of Jack Conway, William Clifford, Viola Barry, Baby Brierly, and others.

"The Girl and the Sheriff" is the release for Friday, June 14th. This dashing, dramatic picture has been directed by Alfred E. Christie, and realistically played by Betty Keller, George Fields, Lee Moran, etc.

These three Nestors revel in charming backgrounds and beautiful photography.

HOT WEATHER HASTENS OPENING OF AIRDOMES.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that the present hot spell has precipitated a big rush in the opening of airdomes, and the demand for moving picture machines and Hallberg Economizers has been very large. The closed theaters not already fitted with proper ventilating equipments are buying exhaust fans and ventilating fans to compete with the open-air shows.

NOVEL LOBBY FRAMES.

Menger & Ring have designed some neat and attractive lobby frames for display photographs, and scenes from special feature films, as well as pictures of actors, etc. These frames are light, portable and serviceable, and will assure a fine display among exhibitors in general.

While answering every purpose in front of the house, they can be folded in an instant and stored in a comparatively small place. They are arranged for carrying and can be carried aboard trolley cars or boats without inconvenience to passengers or objection from officials.

They are made in several styles and are particularly welcome to those enterprising house-owners who wish to advertise attractions in a neat and tasty manner. The frames are made solidly to withstand wear and are a great improvement over those now in use, since they are arranged for instant changes of photos if so desired.

GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE FILM BRANCH.

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., 42 E. 14th St., having received so many inquiries from exhibitors in the South, demanding its features, has opened a branch renting office in Baltimore. On Monday, June 3rd, Charles Abrams, General Manager of the above company, took a trip to the Southern City and installed Jerome Abrams as manager of the Baltimore branch. The books show that the branch is starting off with a good list of renters, having all its features booked up solid for the next three weeks.
